DISSERTATION

TRANSLATED FROM BRUMOY*.

ADVERTISEMENT

I CONCLUDE this work according to my promise, with an account of the Comick Theatre and intreat the reader, whether a favourer or an enemy of the unient Drima, not to pass his censure upon the authors or upon me, without a regular perusal of this whole work. For, though it seems to be composed of pieces of which each may precede or follow without dependence upon the other, yet all the parts taken together, form a system a high would be deof this work the following Advertisement is prefixed. In this 'volume the Discours' of the Greek Comedy and the General Conclusion are translated by the celebrated author of the 'Ramiler The Conedy of the Birds and that of Peace by a young Centleman. stroyed by then disjunction. Which way shall we. come at the knowledge of the ancients' shows, but by comparing together all that is left of them? The value and necessity of this comparison determined me to publish all, or to publish nothing the reflections on each piece, and on the general taste of antiquity, which, in my opinion, are not without importance, have a kind of obscure gradation, which I have carefully endeavoured to preserve, and of which the thread would be lost by him who should slightly glance sometimes upon one piece, and sometimes upon another. It is a structure which I have endeavoured to make as near to regularity as I could, and which must be seen in its full extent and in proper succession The reader who skips here and there over the book, might make a hundred objections which are either anticipated, or answered in those pieces which he might have overlooked I have laid such stress upon the connexion of the parts of this work, that I have declined to exhaust the subject, and have suppressed many of my notions, that I might leave the judicious reader to please himself by forming such conclusions as I supposed him like to discover, as well as myself I am not here attempting to prejudice the reader by an apology either for the ancients, or my own manner I have not claimed a right of obliging others to determine, by my opinion, the degrees of esteem which I think due to the authors of the Athenian Stage, nor do I think that their reputation in the present time, ought to depend upon my mode of thinking or expressing my thoughts. which I leave entirely to the judgment of the Publick.

author is exorbitant, and it is very difficult to draw from the performances of a single poet a just idea of Greek comedy. Beside, it seemed that tragedy was sufficient to employ all my attention that I might give a complete representation of that kind of writing which was most esteemed by the Athe mans and the wiser Greeks*, puticularly by Socrates, who set no value upon comedy or comick actors. But the very name of that dram i, which in polite ages, and above all others in our own, has been so much advanced, that it has become equal to tragedy, if not preferable incline me to think that I may be partly reproached with an imperfect work, if, after having gone as deep as I could into the nature of Greek tragedy, I did not at least sketch a draught of the comedy

I then considered, that it was not wholly impossible to surmount, at least in part, the difficulties which had stopt me, and to go somewhat farther than the learned writers *, who have published in French some pieces of Aristophanes, not that I pietend to make large translations The same reasons which have hindered with respect to the more noble parts of the Greek drama, operate with double force upon my present subject. Though ridicule, which is the business of comedy, be not less uniform in all times, than the passions which are moved by tragick compositions, yet, if diversity of manners may sometimes disguise the passions themselves, how much greater change will be made in jocularities? The truth is, that they are so much changed by the course of time, that pleasantry and indicule become dull and flat much more easily than the pathetick becomes ridiculous.

That which is commonly known by the term jocular and comick, is nothing but atturn of expression, an airy phantom, that must be caught at a particular point. As we lose this point, we lose the jocularity, and find nothing but dulness in its place. A lucky sally, which has filled a company with laughter, will have no effect in print, because it is shown single and separate from the circumstance which gave it force. Many saturcal jests, found in ancient books, have had the same fate, their spirit has evaporated by time, and have left nothing to us but insipidity. None but the most biting passages have preserved their points unblunted.

But, besides this objection, which extends universally to all translations of Austophanes, and many al-Jusions of which time has deprived us, there are loose expressions thrown out to the populace to inise laughter from corrupt passions, which are unworthy of the currenty of decent readers and which ought to rest eternally in proper obscurity. Not every thing in this infiney of comedy was excellent, at least it would not appear excellent it this distance of time, in comparison of compositions of the same kind which he before our eyes, and this is reason enough to save me the trouble of translating, and the reader that of perusing As for that small number of writers who delight in those dehercies, they give themselves very little trouble about translations, except it be to find fruit with them, and the mijority of people of wit, like comedies that may give them pleasure, without much trouble of attention, and are not much disposed to find beauties in that which re quires long deductions to find it beautiful If Helen had not appeared beautiful to the Greeks and Trojuns but by force of argument, we had never been told of the Trojan wir

On the other side Austophanes is in author more considerable than one would imagine The history of Greece could not pass over him when it comes to touch upon the people of Athens, this alone might procure him respect, even when he was not const dered as a comick poet But when his writings are tiken into view, we find him the only author from whom may be drawn a just idea of the comedy of his age and further, we find in his pieces, that he often makes attacks upon the tragick writers parti ŧ в 3

II These considerations have de-The chief heads of this discourse termined me to follow, in my representation of this writer, the same method which I have taken in several tragick pieces, which is that of giving an exact analysis as far as the matter would allow, from which I deduce four important systems First, Upon the nature of the comedy of that age, without omitting that of Menander Secondly, Upon the vices and government of the Athenians Thirdly, Upon the notion we ought to entertain of Aristophanes, with respect to Eschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides Fourthly, Upon the jest which he makes upon the gods These things will not be treated in order, as a regular discourse seems to require, but will ause sometimes separately, sometimes together, from the view of each particular comedy, and from the reflections which this free manner of writing will allow ^{*}Menander, an Athenian, son of Diopethes and Hegestrates, was apparently the most eminent of the writers of the new comedy. He had been a scholar of Theophrastus—his pression for the voinen brought infamy upon him—he was squint-eyed, and very lively. Of the one hundred and eighty comedies, or, according to Suidas, the eighty which he composed, and which are all said to be translated by Terence, we have now only a few tragments remaining. He flourished about the 115th Olympiad, 318 years before the Christian Æra—He was drowned as he was bathing in the port of Pireus—I have told in another place, what is said of one Philemon, his antagonist, not so good a poet as himself, but one who often gained the prize. Nothing is different but the object, which is merely ridicule. This original of true comedy will be easily admitted, if we take the word of Horace, who must have known better than us the true

true dates of dramatick works This poet supports the system which I have endeavoured to establish in the second discourse * so strongly as to amount to demonstrative proof

For ace † expresses himself thus, " Thespis is said "to have been the first inventor of a species of tra-"gedy, in which he carried about in carts, players "smeared with the dregs of wine, of whom some sung " and others declaimed" This was the first attempt both of tragedy and comedy, for Thespis made use only of one speaker, without the least appearance of dialogue " Eschulus afterwards exhibited them with "more dignity He placed them on a stage, some-"what above the ground, covered their faces with "masks, put buskins on their feet, diessed them in "trailing robes, and made them speak in a more "lofty style" Horace omits invention of dialogue, which we learn from Aristotle † But, however, it may be well enough infeired from the following words of Ho, ace, this completion is mentioned while he speaks of Eschylus, and therefore to Eschylus it must be ascribed "Then first appeared the old "comedy, with great success in its beginning" Thus we see that the Greek comedy arose after tragedy, and by consequence tragedy was its paient It was formed in imitation of Eschylus, the inventor of the tragick drama, c., to go yet higher into antiquity, had its original from Homer, who was the guide of Eschylus For, if we ciedit Aristotle §, comedy had its bith from the Margetes, a saturcal poem of Homer, and tragedy from the Ihad and

Odvssey Thus the design and artifice of comedy were drawn from Homer and E chylus Il ha is author This will appear less surprising, since of comedy the ideas of the human mind are als ays gradual, and arts are seldom invented but by imitation. The first idea contains the seed of the second, this second, expanding itself, gives birth to a third, and so on Such is the progress of the mind of man, it proceeds in its productions step by step, in the same manner as nature multiplies her works by imitating or repeating her own act, when she seems most to run into variety. In this manner it was that comedy had its birth, its increase, its improvement, its perfection and its diversity

IV But the question is, who was the happy author of that mutation, and that show, whether only one like Eschylus of trapedy, or whether they were several? for neither Horace, nor any before him, explained this * I his poet only quotes three writers who had reputation in the old Comedy, Eupolis*, Cratinus †, and Aristophanes, of whom he says, 'That they, and others who wrote in the same way, reprehended the faults of particular persons with excessive liberty' These are probably the poets of the greatest reputation, though they were not the first, and we know the names of many others †. Among these three we may be sure that Aristophanes had the greatest character, since not only the king of Persia | expressed a high esteem of him to the Grecian ambassadours, as of a man extremely useful to his country, and Plato & rated him so high, as to say, that the graces resided in his bosom, but likewise because he is the only writer of whom any comedies have made then way down to us, through the confusion of times There are not indeed any proofs that he was the inventor of comedy, properly so called, especially since he had not only predecessors who wrote

^{*} Lupolis was an Athenian, his death, which we shall mention presently, is represented differently by authors, who almost all agree that he was drowned. Llian adds an incident which deserves to be mentioned the says (Book X Of Animals), that one Augeas of Eleusis, made Eupolis a present of a fine mastiff, who was so faithful to his master as to worry to death a slave who was carrying away some of his comedies. He adds, that when the poet died at Egene, his dog stard by his tomb till he perished by grief and hunger

[†] Cratinus of Athens, who was son of Callimedes, died at the age of nimety-seven. He composed twenty comedies, of which nine had the prize he was a daring writer, but a cowardly warrior

in the same kind, but it is at least a sign, that he had contributed more than any other to bring comedy to the perfection in which he left it. We shall, therefore, not inquire further, whether regular comedy was the work of a single mind, which seems yet to be unsettled, or of several contemporaries, such as these which Horace quotes. We must distinguish three forms which comedy wore, in consequence of the genius of the writers, or of the laws of the magistrates, and the change of the government of many into that of few.

That comedy * which Horace calls The old mid the ancient and which, according to dle aud new comedy his account, was after Eschulus, retained something of its original state and of the licentious ness which it pinctised, while it was yet without regularity and attered loose tokes and abuse upon the passers by from the cart of Thespis Though it was now properly modelled as might have been worthy of a great theatre and a numerous audience, and deserved the name of a regular comedy at was not yet much nearer to decency. It was a representation of real actions and exhibited the dress, the motions and the an, as far as could be done in a mask of any one who was thought proper to be sacrificed to publick In a city so free, or to say better so licentious as Athens was at that time nobody was spared, not even the chief magistrate nor the very judges, by whose voice comedies were allowed or prohibited The insolence of those performances reached to open

implety, and sport was made equally with men and gods. These are the features by which the greatest part of the compositions of Aristophanes will be known. In which it may be particularly observed, that not the least appearance of praise will be found, and therefore certainly no trace of flattery or servility.

This licentiousness of the poets, to which in some , soit Socrates fell a sacrifice, at last was restrained by a law For the government, which was before shared by all the inhabitants, was now confined to a settled It was ordered that no man's number of citizens name should be mentioned on the stage, but poetical malignity was not long in finding the secret of defeating the purpose of the law, and of making themselves ample compensation for the restraint laid upon authors, by the necessity of inventing false names They set themselves to work upon known and real characters, so that they had now the advantage of giving a more exquisite gratification to the vanity of poets, and the malice of spectators. One had the refined pleasure of setting others to guess, and the other that of guessing right by naming the masks. When pictures are so like, that the name is not wanted, nobody inscribes it The consequence of the law, therefore, was nothing more than to make that done with delicacy, which was done grossly before, and the art, which was expected would be confined within the limits of duty, was only partly transgressed with more ingenuity Of this Aristophanes, who was complehended in this law, gives us good examples in some of his poems. Such was that which was afterwards called the middle comedy

^{*} It will be shown how and in what sense this was allowed

The new comedy, or that which followed, was again an excellent refinement, prescribed by the magistrates, who, as they had before forbid the use of real names forbid afterwards real subjects and the train of choices* too much given to abuse so that the poets saw themselves reduced to the necessity of bringing imaginary names and subjects upon the stage, which at once purified and enriched the thea tre, for comedy from that time was no longer a fury armed with torches, but a pleasing and innocent mirror of human life

The comedy of Menander and Terence is, in propriety of speech, the fine comedy. I do not repeat all this after so many writers but just to recall it to memory, and to add to what they have said, some thing which they have omitted a singular effect of publick edicts appearing in the successive progress of the art. A naked history of poets and of poetry, such as been often given, is a mere body without soil unless it be enlivened with an account of the birth, progress, and perfection of the art, and of the causes by which they were produced.

VI To omit nothing essential which concerns this part, we shall say a word of the Latin The Latin comedy. comedy When the arts passed from Greece to Rome, comedy took its turn among the rest: but the Romans applied themselves only to the new species, without choius or personal abuse; though perhaps they might have played some translations of the old or the middle comedy, for Pliny gives an account of one which was represented in But the Roman comedy, which was his own time modelled upon the last species of the Greek, hath nevertheless its different ages, according as its authors were rough or polished The pieces of Livius Andromcus", more ancient and less refined than those of the writers who learned the art from him, may be said to compose the first age, or the old Roman comedy and tragedy To him you must join Nevrus his contemporary, and Ennius, who lived some years after The second age comprises Pacuvius, Cecilius, Accius, and Plautus, unless it shall be thought better to reckon Plantus with Tenence, to make the third and highest age of the Latin comedy, which may properly be called the new comedy, especially with regard to Terence, who was the friend of Lelius, and the faithful copier of Menander

But the Romans, without troubling themselves with this order of succession, distinguished their comedies by the diesses† of the players. The robe called prætexta, with large borders of purple, being the formal diess of magistrates in their dignity, and in the exercise of their office, the actors, who had this dress, gave its name to the comedy. This is the same with that called Trabeata *, from Trabea the dress of the consuls in peace, and the generals in triumph The second species introduced the senators not in great offices but as private men, this was called Toges, from Togata The last species was named Tabernaria, from the timick, or the common dress of the people, or rather from the mean houses which were printed on the scene. There is no need of mentioning the farces, which took their name and ouginal from Atella, an ancient town of Campania in Italy, because they differed from the low comedy only by greater licentiousness, nor of those which were called Palliates, from the Greet, a cloak, in which the Greek characters were dressed upon the Roman stage, because that habit only distinguished the nation, not the dignity or character, like those which have been mentioned before To say truth, these are but trifling distinctions, for, as we shall show in the following pages, comedy may be more usefully and judiciously distinguished by the general nature of its subjects As to the Romans, whether they had, or had not, reason for these names, they have left us so little upon the subject which is come down to us. that we need not trouble ourselves with a distinction which affords us no solid satisfaction. Plantus and Terence, the only authors of whom we are in posses sion give us a fuller notion of the real nature of their comedy, with respect at least to their own times than can be received from names and terms, from which we have no real exemplification

VII Not to go too far out of our way, let us return to Aristophanes, the only poet in whom we can The Greek co- now find the Greek comedy He is the only to Aristo- single writer, whom the violence of medy is reduced time has in some degree spared, after phanes having buried in darkness, and almost in forgetfulness, so many great men, of whom we have nothing but the names and a few fragments, and such slight memorials as are scarcely sufficient to defend them against the enemies of the honour of antiquity, yet these memorials are like the last glimmer of the setting sun, which scarce affords us a weak and fading light yet from this glimmer we must endeavour to collect rays of sufficient strength to form a picture of the Greek comedy approaching as near as possible to the truth

Of the personal character of Aristophanes little is known, what account we can give of it must therefore be had from his comedies. It can scarcely be said with certainty of what country he was invectives of his enemies so often called in question his qualification as a citizen, that they have made it doubtful Some said, he was of Rhodes, others of Egena, a little island in the neighbourhood, and all agreed that he was a stranger As to himself, he said that he was the son of Philip, and boin in the Cydatheman quarter, but he confessed that some of his fortune was in Egena, which was probably the original seat of his family He was, however, formally declared a citizen of Athens, upon evidence, whether good or bad, upon a decisive judgment, and this for having having made his judges merry by an application of a saying of *Telemachus, of which this is the sense "Iam, as my mother tells me, the son of Philip, for "my own part, I I now little of the matter, for what "child knows his own father?" This piece of merriment did him as much good, as Archas received from the oration of Cicero†, who said that that poet was a Roman citizen. An honour which if he had not inherited by birth, he deserved for his genus.

Austophanes I flourished in the age of the great men of Greece, particularly of Socrates and Luri pides, both of whom he outlived He made a great figure during the whole Peloponnesian war, not merely as a comick poet by whom the people were diverted, but as the censor of the government, as a man kept in pay by the state to reform it, and almost to act the part of the arbitiator of the publick A. particular account of his comedies will best let us into his personal character as a poet, and into the nature of his genius, which is what we are most interested to know It will however, not be amiss to prepossess our readers a little by the judgments that had been passed upon him by the criticks of our own time, without forgetting one of the ancients that deserves great respect

"the stage To conlude, Plutarch, in his com "parison of these authors, says, that the muse of "Aristophanes is an abandoned prostitute, and that "Gof Menander a modest woman"

It is evident that this whole character is taken from Plutarch Let us now go on with this remark of father Rapin, since we have already spoken of the Latin comeds, of which he gives us a description

" With respect to the two Latin comick noets, " Plantus is ingenious in his designs, happy in his "conceptions, and fruitful of invention " however, according to Horace, some low toculars " ties, and those smart sayings, which made the vul " gar laugh, made him be pitted by men of higher "taste It is true, that some of his jests are ex-" tremely good, but others likewise are very bad "To this every man is exposed, who is too much " determined to make sillies of marriment, they en " deavour to raise that laughter by hyperboles, which " would not arise by a just representation of things " Plantus is not quite so regular as Terence in the "scheme of his designs or in the distribution of his " acts, but he is more simple in his plot for the " fables of Terence are commonly complex, as may " be seen in his Andrea, which contains two amours " It was imputed as a fault to Ierence, that, to bring " more action upon the stage, he made one Latin " comedy out of two Greek , but then Terence un " rayels his plot more naturally than Plantus, which " Plantus did more naturally than Aristophanes , and "though Casar calls Terence but one half of Me " nander, because, though he had softness and " delicacy, there was in him some want of spright " Imess C 2

"Inness and strength; yet he has written in a manner so natural and so judicious, that, though he was then only a copy, he is now an original. No author has ever had a more exact sense of pure nature. Of Cecilius, since we have only a few fragments, I shall say nothing. All that we know of him is told us by Farrus, that he was happy in the choice of subjects."

Rapin omits many others for the same reason, that we have not enough of their works to qualify us for judges. While we are upon this subject, it will perhaps not displease the reader to see what that critick's opinion is of Lopes de Vega and Moliere. It will appear, that, with respect to Lopes de Vega, he is rather too profuse of praise: that in speaking of Moliere, he is too parsimonious. This piece will, however, be of use to our design, when we shall examine to the bottom what it is that ought to make the character of comedy

"No man has ever had a greater genius for comedy "than Lopes de Vega the Spamard He had a fertility of wit, joined with great beauty of conception, and "a wonderful readiness of composition, for he has "written more than three hundred comedies. His name alone gave reputation to his pieces, for his reputation was so well established, that a work, "which came from his hands, was sure to claim the approbation of the public. He had a mind too extensive to be subjected to rules, or restrained by himits. For that reason he gave himself up to his own genius, on which he could always depend with confidence. When he wrote, he consulted no other laws than the taste of his auditors, and regu-

Inted his manner more by the success of his work than by the rules of rea on. Thus he discarded all "scruples of unity and all the superstitions of probability." (This is cert unly not said with a design to pruse him and must be connected with that which amnedately follows.) "But as for the most part," he endeavours at too much jocularity, and carries "ridicule to too much refinement. his conceptions are often rather happy than just, and a ther wild than natural for, by subtilizing meriment too far, it becomes too nice to be true, and his beautics lose "their power of striking by being too deheate and "acute".

' Among us, nobody has carried redicule in co " medy farther than Wollere Our ancient comick " writers brought no characters higher than servants, " to mike sport upon the theatre, but we are di-" verted upon the the tre of Molier c by marquises and " people of quality Others have exhibited in comedy " no species of life above that of a citizen, but Mo " here shows us all Paris, and the court He is the " only m in amone st us, who has I ud open those fea " tures of nature by which he is exactly marked, and "may be accurately known. The beauties of his " pictures are so natural, that they are felt by persons " of the least discernment, and his power of plea-" santry received half its force from his power of cony-His Mis inthrope is, in my opinion, the most "complete, and likewise the most singular character "that has ever appeared upon the stage but the " disposition of his comedies is always defective some "way or another This is all which we can observe "in general upon comedy '

A DISSERTATION ON THE

Such are the thoughts of one of the most refined judges of works of genius, from which, though they are not all oraculous, some advantages may be drawn, as they always make some approaches to truth

Madame Dacier *, having her mind full of the ment of Aristophanes, expresses herself in this manner. " No man had ever more discernment than him, " in finding out the ridiculous, nor a more ingenious "manner of showing it to others. His remarks are "natural and easy, and, what very rarely can be " found, with great copiousness he has great delicacy "To say all at once, the Attick wit, of which the an-" cients made such boast, appears more in Aristo-" phanes than in any other that I know of in anti-"quity But what is most of all to be admired in -"him is, that he is always so much master of the " subject before him, that, without doing any vio-"lence to himself, he finds a way to introduce na-" turally things which at first appeared most distant "from his purpose; and even the most quick and " unexpected of his desultory sallies appear the neces-" sary consequence of the foregoing incidents This " is that art which sets the dialogues of Plato above " imitation, which we must consider as so many dia-"matick pieces, which are equally entertaining by " the action and by the dialogue The style of Aristo-" phanes is no less pleasing than his fancy, for, be-" sides its clearness, its vigour and its sweetness, there " is in it a certain harmony so delightful to the ear, "that there is no pleasure equal to that of reading When he applies himself to vulgar mediocrity of style, he descends without meanness, when he

"attempts the sublime, he is elevated without ob scurity, and no man has ever had the art of blend ing all the different kinds of writing so equally to gether. After hiving studied all that is left us of Grecian learning, if we have not read Aristophanes we cannot yet know all the charms and beauties of that language?

let us suspend our opinion, and hear that timentupon A ristophanes and of Plutarch, who, being an ancient, well Menander deserves our attention, at least after we have heard the moderns before him This is then the sum of his judgment concerning Aristophanes and Menander To Menander he gives the preference, without allowing much competition. He objects to Aristophanes that he carries all his thoughts beyond nature, that he writes rather to the crowd than to men of character, that he affects a style obscure and licentious, tragical, pompous, and mean, sometimes se rious, and sometimes ludicrous even to puerility that he makes none of his personages speak according to invdistinct character so that in his scenes the son cannot be known from the father, the citizen from the boor, the hero from the shopkeeper, or the divine from the serving man. Whereas the diction of Menander which is always uniform and pure, is very justly adapted to different characters rising when it is necessary to vigorous and sprightly comedy yet without transgressing the proper limits, or losing sight of nature, in which Menander, says Plutarch, has attuned a perfection to which no other writer has ar rived. For what man besides himself has ever found the art of making a diction equally suitable to wo men and children, to old and young, to divinities and heroes Now Menander has found this happy secret, in the equality and flexibility of his diction, which, though always the same, is nevertheless different upon different occasions; like a current of clear water (to keep closely to the thoughts of Plutarch), which running through banks differently turned, complies with all their turns backward and forward, without changing any thing of its nature or its purity Plutarch mentions it as a part of the merit of Menander, that he began very young, and was stopped only by old age, at a time when he would have produced the greatest wonders, if death had not prevented him. This, joined to a reflection, which he makes as he returns to Aristophanes, shows that Aristophanes continued a long time to display his powers for his poetry, says Plutarch, is a strumpet that affects sometimes the ans of a plude, but whose impudence cannot be forgiven by the people, and whose affected modesty is despised by men of decency Menander, on the contrary, always shows himself a man agreeable and witty, a companion desirable upon the stage, at table, and in gay assemblies, an extract of all the treasures of Greece, who deserves always to be read, and always to please His irresistible power of persuasion, and the reputation which he has had, of being the best master of language of Greece, sufficiently shows the delightfulness of his style Upon this article of Menander, Plutarch does not know how to make an end: he says, that he is the delight of philosophers fatigued with study, that they use his works as a meadow enamelled with flowers, where a purer air gratifies the sense, that not with standing the powers of the other comick poets of Athens, Menander has always been considered as possessing a sult peculiar to himself, drawn from the same waters that gave birth to Fenus That, on the contrary, the salt of Aristophanes is bitter, keen coar e, and corrosive, that one cannot tell whether his dexterity, which has been to much boasted, consists not more in the characters than in the expression, for he is charged with playing often upon words with affecting antithetical allusions that he has spoiled the copies which he endervoured to take after nature, that artifice in his plays is wickedness and simplicity, brutishness, that his jocularity ought to raise hisses rather than laughter that his amours have more impudence than gryety and that he has not so much written for men of understanding, as for minds blackened with enty and corrupted with debauchery

A After such a character there seems The justifica no need of going further, and one would ton of instance think that it would be better to bury for ever the memory of so hateful a writer, that makes us so poor a recompense for the loss of Menander, who cannot be recalled But, without showing any mercy to the indecent or malicious sallies of Aristophanes, any more than to Plautus his imitator, or at least the inheritor of his genius, may it not be allowed us to do, with respect to him what, if I mistake not, Lucretius* did to Limius from whose muddy versus he gathered jewels? Lini de steriore genings

Besides, we must not believe that Plutarch, who lived more than four ages after Menander, and more than five after Aristophanes, has passed so exact a judgment upon both but that it may be fit to re-examine it. Plato, the contemporary of Aristophanes; thought very differently, at least of his genius; for, in his piece called The Entertainment, he gives that poet a distinguished place, and makes him speak, according to his character, with Socrates himself; from which, by the way, it is apparent, that this dialogue of Plato was composed before the time that Aristophanes wrote his Clouds against Socrates Plato is likewise said to have sent a copy of Aristophanes to Dionysius the tyrant, with advice to read it diligently, if he would attain a complete judgment of the state of the Athenian republick.

Many other scholars have thought, that they might depart somewhat from the opinion of Plutarch. Fischlinus, for example, one of the commentators upon Aristophanes, though he justly allows his taste to be less pure than that of Menander, has yet undertaken his defence against the outrageous censure of the ancient critick In the first place, he condemns without mercy his ribaldity and obscenity. But this part, so worthy of contempt, and written only for the lower people, according to the remark of Bown, bad as it is, after all is not the chief part which is left of Aristophanes I will not say with Frischlinus, that Plutarch seems in this to contradict himself, and in reality commends the poet, when he accuses him of having adapted his language to the stage, by the stage, in this place, he meant the theatre of Farces, on which low muth and buffoonly was exhibited. This plea of Frischlinus is a mere cavil, and though the poet had obtained his end, which was to divert a corrupted populace, he would not have been less a bad man, not less a despicable poet, notwithstanding the excuse of his defender. To be able in the highest degree degree to diver fools and libertines a ill not male a port it is not, therefore, by this defence the two must instify the character of Aris'of heres. The deprived taste of the crowd, a ho once drove away Cratimus and his company, because the scenes had not low hul foonry enough for their taste will not ju tify Aridoplaces, since Menender found nway of changing the taste by riving a rort of comedy no indeed so modest as Ph turch repre entent but less hecotions than before Nor is Aristorhemes bester me ified by the reason which he lums If offers, when he say that he exhibited debruckers upon the stage not to corrupt the morals, but to mend them. The acht of gross faults is rather a poison than a remedy

The applored has foreof one reason, a luch appears to me to be escential to a just account Asfar as we can judge by appearance Platarch had in his hands all the plays of Aristo that es, which were at least fifty in number. In the a be saw mo e been tionsness than has come to our hands though in the cleven that are still remaining there is much more than could be wished

Plutarch censure slum in the recond place for playing upon words and against this charge I resoldent defends him with less skill. It is impossible to exemplify this in French But office ill this part is so little, that it deserved not so severe a reprehension, especirlly since imonest thoses it ings, there are some so mischierously malignant that they became proverbul, it least by the sting of their malice if not by the delicrey of their wit One ca imple will be sufficient spealing of the tix gatherers, or the excisemen of Athens, he crushes them stonce by observing 1 on quod essent rapiai sed hapiai. The word lamie signified ual! ing devoured men, this makes the spirit of the sarcasm against the tax-gatherers. This cannot be rendered in our language, but if any thing as good had been said in France on the like occasion, it would have lasted too long, and, like many other sayings amongst us, been too well received. The best is, that Plutarch himself confesses that it was extiemely applicated.

The third charge is, a mixture of tragick and comick style This accusation is certainly true; Ar istophanes often gets into the buskin but we must examine upon what occasion He does not take upon him the character of a tragick writer, but, having remarked that his trick of parody was always well received by a people who liked to laugh at that for which they had been just weeping, he is eternally using the same craft; and there is scarcely any tragedy or striking passage known by memory by the Athenians, which he does not turn into merriment, by throwing over it a dress of ridicule and builesque, which is done sometimes by changing or transposing the words, and sometimes by an unexpected application of the whole sentence. These are the shreds of tragedy, in which he airays the comick muse, to make her still more comick. Cratinus had before done the same thing; and we know that he made a comedy called Ulysses, to builesque Homer and his Odyssey; which shows, that the wits and poets are, with respect to one another, much the same at all times, and that it was at Athens as here I will prove this system by facts, particularly with respect to the merriment of Aristophanes upon our three celebrated tragedians This being the case, the mingled style of Aristophanes will, perhaps, not deserve so much censure Plutarch

Plutarch has vented We have no need of the Irwesty of Firgil, nor the parodies of our own time, nor of the Lutrin of Boileau to show us that this medley may have its incut upon particular occasions

The same may be aid in ceneral of his ob curity. his meannesses, and his high flights and of all the seeming inequality of style, which puts Plutarch in a rice These consures on never be just upon a poet. whose style has always been allowed to be perfectly Attack, and of an Attacism which made them extremely delightful to the lovers of the Atheman taste Plutarch, perhaps, rather me ans to blame the choruses, of which the language is sometimes elevated, sometimes burlesque, always very poetical, and therefore in appear ancenot suitable to comedy But the chorus, which had been borrowed from tragedy, was then all the fishion, particularly for pieces of sitire, and Anistophanes ad mitted them like the other poets of the old, and perhaps of the middle comedy, whereas Menander sunpressed them, not so much in compliance with his own judgment, as in obedience to the publick edicts. It is not, therefore, this mixture of tragick and comick that will place Aristophanes below Menander

The fifth charge is, that he kept no distinction of character, that, for example he males women speak like or itors, and orators like slives but it appears by the characters which he ridicules, that this objection falls of itself. It is sufficient to say, that a poet who painted not imaginary characters, but real persons, men well known, citizens whom he called by their names, and showed in diesses like their own, and masks resembling their faces, whom he branded in the sight of a whole city, extremely haughty haughty and full of derision, it is sufficient to say, that such a poet could never be supposed to miss his characters. The applause, which his licentiousness produced, is too good a justification, besides, if he had not succeeded, he exposed himself to the fate of Eupolis, who, in a comedy called the Drowned Man, having imprudently pulled to pieces particular persons, more powerful than himself, was laid hold of, and drowned more effectually than those he had drowned upon the open stage.

The condemnation of the poignancy of Aristophanes, as having too much acimony, is better Such was the turn of a species of comedy, in which all licentiousness was allowed: in a nation which made every thing a subject of laughter, in its jealousy of immoderate liberty, and its enmity to all appearance of rule and superiority; for the genius of independency naturally produces a kind of satire more keen than delicate, as may be easily observed in most of the inhabitants of islands If we do not say with Longinus, that a popular government kindles eloquence, and that a lawful monarchy stifles it; at least it is easy to discover by the event, that eloquence in different governments takes a different appearance In republicks it is more sprightly and violent, and in monarchies more insinuating and soft. The same thing may be said of indicule. it follows the cast of genius, as genius follows that of government. Thus the republican raillery, particularly of the age which we are now considering, must have been rougher than that of the age which followed it, for the same reason, that Horace is more delicate, and Lucilius more pointed. A dish of satire was always a delicious tre it to human malignity, but that dish was differently sersoned, as the manners were polished more or le s By polished manners I mean that goodbreeding, that art of reserve and self restraint, which is the consequence of dependence. If one was to determine the preference due to one of those kinds of pleasantry of which both have their value there would not need a moment's hesitation every voice would join in favour of the softer, vet without contempt of that which is rough Menander will, therefore, be preferred but Ar istophanes will not be despised esne cially since he was the first who quitted that wild practice of saturising at liberty right or wrong and by a comedy of another cast made way for the manner of Menander, more agreeable yet and less dangerous There is yet another distinction to be made between the acrimony of the one and the softness of the other the works of the one are acromomous, and of the other soft because the one exhibited personal and the other general characters, which leaves us still at liberty to examine, if these different designs might not be exe cuted with equal delicacy

We shall know this by a view of the particulars, in this place we say only that the reigning taste, or the love of striking likenesses, might justify Aristo phanes for having turned, as Phitaich says, art into malignity, simplicity into brutality, merriment into farce, and amour into impudence, if in any age a poet could be excused for painting publick folly and vice in their true colours

There is a motive of interest at the bottom which disposed Chan, Plutarch, and many others, to con demn this poet without appeal Socrates, who is said to have been destroyed by a postical attack, at the instigation of two wretches *, has too many friends among good men, to have pardon granted to so horrid This has filled them with an implacable hatred against Aristophanes, which is mingled with the spirit of philosophy, a spirit, wherever it comes, more dangerous than any other. A common enemy will confess some good qualities in his adversary, but a philosopher, made partial by philosophy, is never at rest till he has totally destroyed him who has huit the most tender part of his heart, that is, has disturbed him in his adherence to some character, which, like that of Sociales, takes possession of the mind mind is the freest part of man, and the most tender of its liberties · possessions, life, and reputation, may be in another's power, but opinion is always independent. If any man can obtain that gentle influence, by which he ingratiates himself with the understanding, and makes a sect in a commonwealth, his followers will sacrifice themselves for him, and nobody will be pardoned that dares to attack him justly or unjustly, because that truth, real or imaginary, which he maintained, is now become an idol. Time will do nothing for the extinction of this hatred; it will be propagated from age to age, and there is no hope that Aristophanes will ever be treated with tenderness by the disciples of Plato, who made Socrates his hero Every body else may, perhaps, confess, that Aristophanes, though in one instance a bad man, may nevertheless be a good poet; but distinctions, like these, will not

As Indd my own reason such a they are for or again t Iristopianes to the cof I risellin's his de fender, I mu t not omit one thing which he he s fo got, and which perhaps without taling in the rest, put Plutarch out of humour, which is that perpetual force which goes through all the comedies of Ariger haves, lile the character of Harlego con the Italian theat e What I and of personal especial olds from which and limbs Plutarel used to commit time of very dit ferent appearance much have thought them stringe things, and yet trunger mu takes uppear to us who have a newer kind of comeds with which the Greet's were unacquanted. This is what our poet may be Charged with and what may be proved be conductor tition. This char comprises illabore t and i, un t this I half not pretend to me tify him. It would be of no u e to say, that Aristopharee wrote for in age that required how which filled the eye and protesque paintings in atmed performances, that the crowde of spectator which sometimes ne lected Cratin is to throng Iristophares obliged him more indimore to comply with the ruling ty to let he should lo the publick fixour by pictures more delicate and less striking, that in a state where it was conjudered as policy to by open every thin, that had the appearance of ambition, emulicity or largery coincily was be come a haranguer, a reformer and a publick counsellor from whom the people learned to take care of theirmost's liable interests and that this comedy, in the attempt to lead and to ple see the people, claimed are lit to the strongest touches of cloquence, and had Vir III likewi a D

likewise the power of personal painting peculiar to herself All these reasons, and many others, would disappear immediately, and my mouth would be stopped with a single word, with which every body would agree. my antagonist would tell me that such an age was to be pitied, and passing on from age to age, till he came to our own, he would conclude flatly, that we are the only possessors of common sense, a determination with which the French are too much reproached, and which overthrows all the prejudice in favour of antiquity. At the sight of so many happy touches, which one cannot help admining in Aristophanes, a man might, perhaps, be inclined to lament that such a genius was thrown into an age of fools. but what age has been without them? And have not we ourselves reason to fear, lest posterity should judge of Moliere and his age, as we judge of Aristophanes? - Menander altered the taste, and was applauded in Athens, but it was after Athens was changed Terence imitated him at Rome, and obtained the picference over Plautus, though Casar called him but a demi-Menander, because he appears to want that spirit and vivacity which he calls the vis comica We are now weary of the manner of Menander and Terence, and leave them for Moliere, who appears like a new star Who can answer, that in such an in a new course interval of time as has past between these four writers there will not ause another author, or another taste, that may bring Moliere, in his turn, into neglect? Without going further, our neighbours, the English, think he wants force and fire Whether they are right, or no, is another question, all that I mean to advance is, that we are to fix it as a conclusion, thatcomick comick authors must grow obsolete with the modes of life if we admit any one age, or any one climate, for the sovereign rule of taste. But let us talk with more exactness, and endeavour by an exact analysis to find out what there is in comedy, whether of Anstophanes and Plautus, of Menander and Tenence of Mohere and his rivits, which is never obsolete, and must place all ages and all nations

XI I now speak particularly of co medy for we must observe that be tween that and other works of literature, especially tragedy there is an essential difference which the chemics of intiquity will not understand, and which I shall endeavour palpably to show

Remarkable difference be tween the state of comedy and other works of genus with re gard to their duration

All works show the age in which they are pro duced they carry its stamp upon them, the man ners of the times are impressed by indelible marks If it be allowed that the best of past times were rude. in comparison with ours, the cause of the incients is decided against them', and the want of politeness. with which their works are charged in our days must be generally confessed. History alone seems to claim exemption from this accusation. Nobody will dure to say of Herodotus or Thucydides of Livius or Facitus, that which has been said without scruple of Homer and the ancient poets. The reason is that history tal es the nearest way to its purpose and sives the characters and practices of nations, be they what they will, it has no dependence upon its subject and offers nothing to examination, but the ait of the narrative An history of China well written would please a Frenchman as well as one of Trance It is otherwise with mere works of genius, they depend upon their subjects, and consequently upon the characters and the practices of the times in which they were written; this at least is the light in which they are beheld. This rule of judgment is not equitable, for, as I have said over and over, all the orators and the poets are painters, and merely painters They exhibit nature as it is before them, influenced by the accidents of education, which, without changing it infliely, yet give it, in different ages and climates, a different appearance; but we make then success depend in a great degree upon their subject, that is, upon circumstances which we measure by the circumstances of our own days According to this prejudice, oratory depends more upon its subject than history, and poetry yet more than oratory Our times, therefore, show more regard to Herodotus and Suctonius, than to Demosthenes and Cicero, and more to all these than to Homer of Virgil Of this prejudice, there are regular gradations, and to come back to the point which we have left, we show, for the same imperceptible reason, less regard to tragick poets than to others. The reason is, that the subjects of their paintings are more examined than the art Thus comparing the Achilles and Hippolytus of Euripides, with those of Racine, we drive them off the stage, without considering that Racine's heroes will be driven off, in a future age, if the same rule of judgment be followed, and one time be measured by another

Yet tragedy having the passions for its object, is not wholly exposed to the caprice of our taste, which would make our own manners the rule of human kind, for the passions of Grecian heroes are often dressed in external modes of appearance that disgust us, yet they break through the yell when they mestrongly marked as we cannot deny them to be in Eschylus, Sophocles and Euripide The es ence then gets the better of the circumstance The passions of Greece and France do not so much differ by the particular characters of particular ages as they agree by the participation of that which belongs to the same passion in all ages Our three tragick poets will, therefore, get clear by suffering only a little ridicule which fills directly upon their times, but these times and themselves will be well recommen ed by the admiration which their art will irresistibly enforce

Comedy is in a more lamentable situation, for, not only its object is the ridiculous, which though in reality always the same, as so dependant on custom as to change its appearance with time, and with place but the art of a comick writer is to lav hold of that spec es of the ridiculous which will a tah the spectators of the present hour, without regard to fu turity But though comedy has att uned its end, and diverted the pit, for which it was written, if it goes down to posterity it is in a new world, where it is no longer known it becomes there quite a foreigner, because there are no longer the same originals, nor the same species of the ridiculous, not the same spect iters, but a set of merciless readers who complan that they are tired with it though it once filled Athens, Rome, or Paris, with merriment This pcsition is general, and comprises all poets and all ages To say all at once comedy is the slave of its subject, and of the reigning taste, tragedy is not subject to the same degree of slavery, because the ends of the two species of poetry are different For this reason, 1f if we suppose that in all ages there are criticks who measure every thing by the same rule, it will follow, that if the comedy of Aristophanes be become obsolete, that of Menander likewise, after having delighted Athens, and revived again at Rome, at last suffered by the force of time The Muse of Moliere has almost made both of them forgotten, and would still be walking the stage, if the desire of novelty did not in time make us weary of that which we have too fiequently admired.

Those who have endeavoured to render their judgment independant upon manners and customs, and of 'such men there have been always some, have not judged so severely either of times or of writers; they - have discovered that a certain resemblance runs through all polished ages, which are alike in essential things, and differ only in external manners, which, if we except religion, are things of indifference, that wherever there is genius, politeness, liberty, or plenty, there prevails an exact and delicate taste, which, however hard to be expressed, is felt by those that were born to feel it, that Athens, the inventiess of all the aits, the mother first of the Roman and then of general taste, did not consist of stupid savages, that the Atheman and Augustan ages having always been considered as times that enjoyed a particular privilege of excellence, though we may distinguish the good authors from the bad, as in our own days, yet we ought to suspend the vehemence of cuticism, and proceed with caution and timidity before we pass sentence upon times and writers, whose good taste has been universally applauded This obvious consideration has disposed them to pause, they have endeavoured to discover the original of taste, and 1 have found that there is not only a table and immutable beauty, as there is a common understanding in all times and places, which is never obsolet. But there is unother kind of boauty, such as we are now treating, which depends upon times and places and is therefore changeable. Such is the imperfection of every thing below, that one mode of beauty is never found without a mixture of the other and from these two blended together results what is called the taste of anage. I am now speaking of an age sprightly and polite an age which leaves works for a long time behind it, an age which is imitated or criticised when revolutions have thrown it out of sight.

Upon this incontestable principle which supposes a beauty universal and absolute and a beauty likewise relative and particula, which are mingled through one work in very different proportions, it is easy to give an account of the contrary judgments passed on Aristo phanes If we consider him only with re pect to the benuties, which, though they do not please us, de highted the Athenians we shall condemn him at once. though even this sort of be aity may sometimes have itsoriginal in universal beauty carried to extravagance Instead of commending him for being able to give morriment to the most refined nation of those days we shall proceed to place that people with all their atticism in the rank of sayages whom we take upon us to degrade because they have no other qualifications but innocence and pl un understanding But have not we likewise amidst our more polished manners beautics merely fashionable which make part of our writings as of the writings of former times, be inties of which our self love now makes us fond but which perhaps, will disgust our grandsons? Let us be more equitable, let us leave this relative beauty to its real value more or less in every age or, if we must pass judgment upon it, let us say that these touches in Aristophanes, Menander, and Moliere, were well struck off in their own time, but, that comparing them with true beauty, that part of Aristophanes was a colouring too strong, that of Menander was too weak, and that of Moliere was a peculiar variash formed of one and the other, which, without being an imitation, is itself inimitable, yet depending upon time, which will efface it by degrees, as our notions, which are every day changing, shall receive a sensible alteration. Much of this has already happened since the time of Moliere, who, if he was now to come again, must take a new road.

With respect to unalterable beautics, of which comedy admits much fewer than tragedy, when they are the subject of our consideration, we must not too easily set Aristophanes and Plantus below Menander and Terence We may properly hesitate with Boileau, whether we shall prefer the French comedy to the

In truth Aristophanes and Plautus united buf foonery and deheacy in a greater degree than Molere, and for this they may be blamed. That which then pleased at Athens and at Rome, was a transitory beauty, which had not sufficient foundation in truth, and therefore the taste changed. But if we condemn those ages for this, what age shall a espare? Let us refer every thing to permanent and universal taste and we shall find in Aristophanes at least as much to commend as censure.

XII But before we go on to his works it may be allowed to make some reflections upon tragedy and comedy. Tragedy though different according to the difference of times and writers is uniform in its nature being founded upon the passions which never change. With comedy it is otherwise. Whatever difference there is between Eschylus Sophocles, and Luripides, between Corneille and Racine, between the French and the Greeks, it will not be found sufficient to constitute more than one species of traged.

The works of those great masters are, in some re spects like the sea nymphs of whom Oud says, 'That their faces were not the same yet so much "alike that they might be known to be sisters

Facues non ommbus una, Nec du ersa tamen, qualem decet esse sororum

The reason is that the same passions give action and animation to them all. With respect to the comedies of Aristophanes and Plautus, Menanaer and Terence, Molure and lus imitators, if we compare them

them one with another, we shall find something of a family likeness, but much less strongly marked, on account of the different appearance which ridicule and pleasantry take from the different manners of every age They will not pass for sisters, but for very distant relations The Muse of Aristophanes and Plautus, to speak of her with justice, is a bacchanal at least, whose malignant tongue is dipped in gall, or in poison dangerous as that of the aspick or viper, but whose bursts of malice, and sallies of wit, often give a blow where it is not expected The Muse of Terence, and consequently of Menander, is an artless and unpainted beauty, of easy gayety, whose features are rather delicate than striking, rather soft than strong, rather plain and modest than great and haughty, but always perfectly natural

The Muse of Mohere is not always plainly diesed, but takes airs of quality, and rises above her original condition, so as to attrie herself gracefully in magnificent apparel. In her manners she mingle's elegance with foolery, force with delicacy, and grandeur, or even haughtness, with plainness and modesty. If sometimes, to please the people, she gives a loose to faice, it is only the gay folly of a moment, from which she immediately returns, and which lasts no longer than a slight intoxication. The first might be painted encircled with little satyrs, some grossly foolish, the others delicate, but all extremely licentious and malignant, monkeys always ready to laugh in your face, and to point out to indiscrimin the ridicule, the good and the bad The second may be shown encircled with geniuses full of softness and of candour, taught to please by nature alone, and whose honeyed dialect is so much the more insinuating as there is no tempta tion to distrust it The last mu t be accompanied with the delicate laughter of the court, and that of the city somewhat more coarse and neither the one nor the other can be separated from her The Muse of Aristophanes and of Plautus can never be denied the honour of sprightliness animation, and invention, nor that of Menander and Terence the praise of nature and of delicacy to that of Mohere must be allowed the happy secret of uniting all the piquancy of the former, with a peculiar ait which they did not know Of these three sorts of ment, let us show to each the justice that is due let us in each separate the pure and the true from the false gold, without ap proving or condemning either the one or the other in the gioss If we must pronounce in general upon the taste of their writings we must indisputably allow that Menander, Terence, and Moliere will give most pleasure to a decent audience, and consequently that they approach nearer to the true beauty, and have less mixture of beauties purely relative, than Plautus and Aristophanes

If we distinguish comedy by its subjects, we shall find three sorts among the Greeks and asm my among the Latins, all differently dressed if we distinguish it by ages and authors, we shall again find three sorts, and we shall find three sorts a third time if we regard more closely the subject. As the ultimate and general rules of all these sorts of comedy are the same, same, it will, perhaps, be agreeable to our purpose to sketch them out before we give a full display of the last class. I can do nothing better on this occasion than transcribe the twenty-fifth reflection of Rapin upon poetry in particular

XIII "Comedy, says he +, is a re-General rules of comedy. " presentation of common life its end " is to show the faults of particular characters on the stage, to correct the disorder of the people by the "fear of ridicule Thus ridicule is the essential part Ridicule may be in words, or in " of a comedy "things, it may be decent, or giotesque " what is ridiculous in every thing, is the gift merely "of nature, for all the actions of life have their " bright and their dark sides, something serious, "and something merry But Aristotle, who has "given rules for drawing tears, has given none for "raising laughter, for this is meiely the work of r nature, and must proceed from genius, with very " little help from art or matter The Spaniards have " a turn to find the ridicule in things much more than "we: and the Italians, who are natural comedians, " have a better turn for expressing it, their language " is more proper for it than ours, by an air of drollery " which it can put on, and of which ours may become " capable when it shall be brought nearer to perfec-In short, that agreeable turn, that gavety " which yet maintains the delicacy of its character " without falling into dulness or into buffoonery, that " elegant raillery which is the flower of fine wit, is "the qualification which comedy requires " must, however, remember that the true artificial " ridicule. * Reflexions sur la Poit p. 154 Paris, 1684.

XIV These rules indeed, are com-Three sorts of mon to the three kinds which I have in comedy my mind, but it is necessary to distinguish each from the rest, which may be done by diversity of matter, which always makes some diversity of management The old and middle comedy simply represented real adventures in the same way some passages of history and of fable might form a clas of comedies. which should resemble it without having its fulls. such is the Amplutryon How many moral tales, how many adventures ancient and modern how many little fables of Eson of Plachus of Fontaine, or some other uncient poet, would make pretty exhibitions if they were all made use of as materials by skilful hands? And have we not seen some like Timon the Man Hater, that have been successful in this way? This sort chiefly regards the Italians The ancient exhibition called a satyre because the satyrs played their part in it of which we have no other instance than the Cyclops of Luripides, has, without doubt given occasion to the pastoral comedies for which we are chiefly indebted to Italy, and which are there more cultivated than in France It is, however, a kind of exhibition that would be we its charms if it was touched with elegance and without meanness it is the pastoral put into action To conclude, the new comedy, invented by Menander has produced the comedy properly so called in our times. This is that which has for its subject general pictures of common life, and feigned names and adventures whether of the court or of the city This third kind is incontest ably the most noble, and has received the strongest sanction from custom. It is likewise the most difficult to perform, because it is merely the work of invention in which the poet has no help from real passages, or persons, which the tragick poet always makes use of Who knows but by deep thinking, another kind of comedy may be invented wholly different from the three which I have mentioned, such is the fruitfulness of comedy but its course is already too wide for the discovery of new fields to be wished, and on ground where we are already so apt to stumble, nothing is so dangerous as novelty imperfectly understood This is the rock on which men have often split in every kind of puisuit, to go no further, in that of grammar and language it is better to endeayour after novelty in the manner of expressing common things, than to hunt for ideas out of the way, in which many a man loses himself The ill success of that odd composition Traguk Comedy, a monster wholly unknown to antiquity, sufficiently shows the danger of novelty in attempts like these

Whether tragedy XV To finish the parallel of the two or comedy be the dramas, a question may be revived harder to write equally common and important, which has been oftener proposed than well decide!: it is whether comedy or tragedy be most easy or difficult to be well executed I shall not have the tementy to determine positively a question which so many great geniuses have been afraid to decide but if it be allowed to every literary man to give his reason for and against a mere work of genrus, considered without respect to its good or bad tendency, I shall in a few words give my opinion, drawn from the nature of the two works, and the qualifications they demand Horace * proposes a question nearly of the same kind "It has been enguned, whether "a good poem be the work of ait or nature. * Poet v 407. " for it for my part, I do not see much to be done by art " without genius, nor by genius without knowledge "The one is necessary to the other, and the suc-" cess depends upon their cooperation" If we should endersour to accommodate matters in imitation of this decision of Horace it were easy to say at once. that supposing two geniu es equil, one tragicle and the other comick, supposing the art likewise equal in each, one would be as easy or difficult as the other, but this, though satisfactory in the simple question put by Horace, will not be sufficient here Nobody can doubt but genius and industry contribute their part to every thing valuable, and particularly to good poetry But if genius and study were to be weighed one against the other, in order to discover which must contribute most to a good work, the question would become more curious, and, perhaps, very difficult of Indeed though nature must have a great part of the expense of poetry, yet no poetry lasts long that is not very correct the balance, therefore, seems to incline in favour of correction For is it not known that Virgil with less genius than Ovid is yet valued more by men of exquisite judgment, or without going so fir, Boileau the Horace of our time, who composed with so much labour and asked Moliere where he found his rlivme so easily, has said " If " I write four words I shall blot out three, has not Boileau, by his polished lines, retouched and retouched a thousand times guined the preference above the works of the same Wo'ere, which are so natural, and produced by so fruitful a genius! Horace was of that opinion, for when he is teaching the writers of his age the art of poetry, he tells them in plain terms Vot. III that Rome would excel in writing as in aims, if the poets were not afraid of the labour, patience, and time required to polish their pieces. He thought every poem was bad that had not been brought ten times back to the anvil, and required that a work should be kept nine years, as a child is nine months in the womb of its mother, to restrain that natural impatience which combine with sloth and self-love to disguise faults, so certain is it that correction is the touchstone of writing

The question proposed comes back to the comparison which I have been making between genius and correction, since we are now engaged in enquiring whether there is more or less difficulty in writing tragedy or comedy: for as we must compare nature and study one with another, since they must both concur more or less to make a poet, so if we will compare the labours of two different minds in different kinds of writing, we must, with regard to the authors, compare the force of genius, and with respect to the composition, the difficulties of the task

The genus of the tragick and comick writer will be easily allowed to be remote from each other. Every performance, be what it will, requires a turn of mind which a man cannot confer upon himself. It is purely the gift of nature, which determines those who have it, to pursue, almost in spite of themselves, the taste which predominates in their minds. Pascal found in his childhood, that he was a mathematician, and Vandyke that he was born a painter. Sometimes this internal direction of the mind does not make such evident discoveries of itself, but it is rare to find Corneilles who have lived long without knowing that they were poets Corneille having once got some notion of his powers, tried a long time on all sides to know what particular airection he hould take He had first made an attempt in comedy, in an age when it was yet so gross in France that it could give no plea sure to polite persons Melite was so well received when he dressed her out, that she gave use to a new species of comedy and comedians. This success which encouraged Corn ille to pursue that sort of comedy of which he was the first inventor, left him no reason to imagine, that he was one day to produce those master pieces of tragedy which his muse displayed afterwards with so much splendour, and yet less did he imagine that his comick pieces, which, for want of any that were preferable, were then very much infushion, would be celipsed by another genius* formed mon the Greel's and Romans, and who would add to their excellencies improvements of his own, and that this modish comedy to which Corneille, as to his idol, dedicated his labours, would quickly be forgot He wrote first Medea, and afterwards the Cid, and by that prodigious flight of his genius, he discovered, though late, that nature had formed him to 1 un in no other course but that of Sophocles Happy genius! that, without rule or imitation, could at once take so high a flight, having once, as I may say, made himself an eagle he never afterwards quitted the nath, which he had worked out for himself over the heads of the writers of his time yet he retained some traces of the false taste which infected the whole nation, but even in this, he de erres our admiration, since in time he changed it completely by the reflections he made, and those he occasioned. In short, Corneille was born for tragedy, as Moliere for comedy. Moliere, indeed, knew his own genius sooner, and was not less happy in procuring applause, though it often happened to him as to Corneille, L'Ignorance & l'Erreur à ses naissantes pièces En habit de Marquis, en robes de Comtesses, Vinssent pour dissamer son chef-d'œuvre nouveau, Et secouer la tête à l'endroit le plus beau.

But, without taking any faither notice of the time at which either came to the knowledge of his own genius, let us suppose that the powers of tragedy and comedy were as equally shared between Molicie and Corneille, as they are different in their own nature, and then nothing more will remain than to compare the several difficulties of each composition, and to rate those difficulties together which are common to both.

It appears, first, that the tragick poet has in his subject an advantage over the comick, for he takes it from history, and his rival, at least in the more elevated and splendid comedy, is obliged to form it by his own invention. Now, it is not so easy as it might seem to find comick subjects capable of a new and pleasing form, but history is a source, if not inexhaustible, yet certainly so copious as never to leave the genius aground. It is true, that invention seems to have a wider field than history real facts are limited in their number, but the facts which may be feigned have no end, but though, in this respect, invention invention may be allowed to have the advantage is the difficulty of inventing to be accounted asnothing? To make a tragedy is to get materials together, and to make use of them like a skilful architect, but to make a comedy, is to build like Esop in the air At is in vain to boast that the compass of invention is as wide as the extent of desire every thing is limited, and the mind of man like every thing else Besides, invention must be in conformity to niture, but distinct and remarkable characters are very rare in nature herself Moliere has got hold on the principal touches of ridicule If any man should bring charac ers less strong, he will be in danger of Where Comedy is to be kept up by subordinate personages, it is in great danger. All the force of a picture must arise from the principal persons and not from the multitude clustered up together In the same manner, a comedy, to be good, must be supported by a single striking character, and not by under parts

But, on the contrary trajeck characters are without number, though of them the general outlines are limited but dissimulation, perlousy, policy ambition, desire of dominion, and other interests and passions are various without end, and take a thousand different forms in different stuations of histoy, so that as long as there is tragedy, there may be always novelty. Thus the perlous and dissembling Math ridates, so brapily painted by Pa me, will not stand in the way of a poet who shall attempt a jealous and dissembling Tio rius. The stormy violence of an Achilles will always leave room for the stormy violence of Alexander

But the case is very different with availce, trifling vanity, hypocrisy, and other vices, considered as ridi-It would be safer to double and treble all the tragedies of our greatest poets, and use all their subjects over and over, as has been done with Œdipus and Sophonisba, than to bring again upon the stage in five acts a Miser, a Citizen turned Gentleman, a Tartuffe, and other subjects sufficiently known that these popular vices are less capable of diversification, or arcless varied by different circumstances, than the vices and passions of heroes, but that if they were to be brought over again in comedies, they would be less distinct, less exact, less forcible, and, consequently, less applauded Pleasantry and ridicule must be more strongly marked than heroism and pathos, which support themselves by their own force. Besides, though these two things of so different natures could support themselves equally in equal variety, which is very far from being the case, yet comedy, as it now stands, consists not in incidents, but Now it is by incidents only that characters are diversified, as well upon the stage of comedy, as upon the stage of life Comedy, as Molieic has left it, resembles the pictures of manners drawn by the celebrated La Bruyere Would any man after him venture to draw them over again, he would expose himself to the fate of those who have ventured to continue them For instance, what could we add to his character of the Absent Man? Shall we put him in other circumstances? The principal strokes of absence of mind will always be the same, and there are only those striking touches which are fit for a comedy, of which the end is painting after nature, but with with strength and sprightliness like the designs of Callot If comedy were among us what it is in Spain, a kind of romance, consisting of miny circumstances and intrigue perplexed and disentantled so as to if it was nearly the same with that which Con neille practised in his time, if like that of Terence, at went no further than to draw the common portruts of simple nature, and show us fathers, sons, and rivals notwithstanding the uniformity, which would always prevail as in the plays of Terence, and pro bably in those of Menender, whom he imitated in his four first pieces, there would always be a resource found either in variety of incidents, like those of the Spamards, or in the repetition of the same characters an the way of Terence but the cre is now very dif ferent, the publick calls for new characters and no thing else Multiplicity of accidents, and the laborious continance of an intrigue, are not now allowed to shelter a weak genus that would find great conveniencies in that way of writing. Nor does it suit the taste of comedy, which requires an airless constrained, and such freedom and ease of manners as admits nothing of the iominitiek. She leaves all the pomp of sudden events to the novels, or little romances, which were the diversion of the last age. She allows nothing but a succession of characters resembling nature, and filling in without any apparent contrivance Racine has likewise trught us to give to trugedy the same simplicity of air and action, he has endeavoured to disentingle it from that great number of incidents. which made it rather a study than diversion to the audience, and which show the poet not so much to abound in invention as to be deficient in taste. But, notwith-E A notwithstanding all that he has done, or that we can do, to make it simple, it will always have the advantage over comedy in the number of its subjects, because it admits more variety of situations and events, which give variety and novelty to the characters. A miser, copied after nature, will always be the miser of Plautus or Moliere, but a Nero, or a prince like Nero, will not always be the hero of Racme. Comedy admits of so little intrigue, that the miser cannot be shown in any such position as will make his picture new, but the great events of tragedy may put Nero in such circumstances as to make him wholly another character

But, in the second place, over and above the subjects, may we not say something concerning the final purpose of comedy and trazedy? The purpose of the one is to divert, and the other to move; and of these two, which is the easier? To go to the bottom of those purposes, to move is to strike those strings of the neart which is most natural, terrour and pity to divert is to make one laugh, a thing which indeed is natural enough, but more delicate The gentleman and the rustick have both sensibility and tenderness of heart, perhaps in greater or less degree, but as they are men alike, the heart is moved by the same They both love likewise to send their thoughts abroad, and to expand themselves in merriment, but the springs which must be touched for this purpose, are not the same in the gentleman and the rustick The passions depend on nature, and merriment upon education The clown will laugh at a waggery, and the gentleman only at a stroke of delicate conceit. The spectators of a tragedy, tragedy, if they have but a little knowledge, are almost all on a level, but with respect to comedy, we have three classes, if not more, the people the learned, and the court If there are certain cases in which all may be comprehended in the term people this is not one of those cases. Whatever father Rapin may say about it we are more willing even to admire than to laugh Every man that has any power of distinction laughs as rarely as the philosopher ad mues, for we me not to reckon those fits of laughter which are not incited by nature and which are given merely to complue ance to respect, flatters, and good humour, such as break out at sayings which pre tend to smutne s in assembles. The laughter of the theatre is of another stump. Every reader and spectator judges of wit by his own stundard and measures it by his capacity or by his condition the different capacities and conditions of men make them discried on very different occasion If, therefore we con sider the end of the trasick and comicl poet the comedian mu t be involved in much mo e difficulties without taking in the obstructions to be encountered equally by both in an art which consists in raising the passions, or the mirth of a great multitude. The tragedian has little to do but to reflect upon his own thought, and draw from his heart the esentiments which will certainly make their way to the hearts of others, if he found them in his own The other must take many forms and change him elf ilmost into as many persons, as he undertakes to satisfy and divert

It may be said that, if genius he suppo ed equal, and success supposed to depend upon genius the business will be equally easy and difficult to one author and to the other. This objection is of no weight; for the same question still recuis, which is, whether of these two kinds of genius is more valuable or more rare. If we proceed by example, and not by reasoning, we shall decide I think in favour of comedy.

It may be said, that, if merely ait be considered, it will require deeper thoughts to form a plan just and simple, to produce happy surprises without apparent contrivance; to carry a passion skilfully through its gradations to its height; to arrive happily to the end by always moving from it, as Ithaca seemed to fly Ulysses, to unite the acts and scenes; and to raise by insensible degrees a striking edifice, of which the least ment shall be exactness of proportion. be added, that in comedy this art is infinitely less, for there the characters come upon the stage with very little artifice or plot: the whole scheme is so connected that we see it at once, and the plan and disposition of the parts make a small part of its excellence, in comparison of a gloss of pleasantry diffused over each scene, which is more the happy effect of a lucky moment, than of long consideration

These objections, and many others, which so fruitful a subject might easily suggest, it is not difficult to refute; and if we were to judge by the impression made on the mind by tragedies and comedies of equal excellence, perhaps, when we examine those impressions, it will be found that a sally of pleasantry, which diverts all the world, required more thought than a passage which gave the highest pleasure in tragedy; and to this determination we shall be more inclined when a closer examination shall show us, that a happy voin of tragedy is opened and offused at less expense, than a well placed witticism in comedy has required merely to assign its place

It would be too much to dwell long upon such a digression, and as I have no business to decide the question, I leave both that and my arguments to the taste of each particular leader, who will find what is to be said for or against it. My purpose was only to say of comedy, considered as a work of genius. all that a man of letters can be supposed to deliver without departing from his character, and without pallinting in any degree the corrupt use which has been almost always made of an exhibition which in its nature might be innocent, but has been vicious from the time that it has been injected with the wickedness of men It is not for public exhibitions that I am now writing, but for literary inquines The stage is too much frequented, and books too and Rome that we are indebted for that valuable taste, which will be insensibly lost by the affected negligence which now prevuls of having recourse to originals If reason has been a considerable gamer, it must be confessed that taste has been somewhat a loser

To return to Aristophanes So many great men of antiquity, through a long succession of ages, down to our times have set avalue upon his works, that we cannot naturally suppose them contemptible, notwithstanding the essential faults with which he may be justly reproached. It is sufficient to say that he was esteemed by Plato and Cicero; and to conclude by that which doeshim most Lonein, but full falls short of justification, the strong and sprightly eloquence of St Chrysortom drew its support from the masculine and vigorous atticism of this saicastic comedian, to whom the father paid the same regard as Alexander to Homer, that of putting his works under his pillow, that he might read them at night before he slept, and in the morning as soon as he awaked.

II The first is the character of the ancient comedy, which has no likeness to any thing in nature. Its genius is so wild and strange, that it scarce admits a definition. In what class of comedy must we place it? It appears to me to be a species of writing by itself we had Phrynicus, Plato, Eupolis, Critinus, Ameipsias, and so many other celebrated rivals of Aristophanes, of whom all that we can find are a few fragments scattered in Plutarch, Athenias, and Suidas, we might compare them with our poet, settle the general scheme, observe the minuter differences, and form a complete notion of their comick stage for want of all this we can fix only on Aristophanes, and it is true that he may be in some measure sufficient to furnish a telerable judgment of the old comedy; for if we believe him, and who can be better credited? he was the most daring of all his biethien the poets, who practised the same kind of writing. Upon this supposition we may conclude, that the comedy of those days consisted in an allegory drawn out and continued, an allegory never very regular, but often ingenious, and almost always carried beyond strict propriety, of satire keen and biting, but diversified, sprightly and unexpected, so that the wound was given before it was perceived points of satire were thunderbolts, and their wild figures, with their variety and quickness, had the effect of lightning. Their imitation was carried even to resemblance of persons, and their common entertainments was a parody of rival poets joined, if I may so express it, with a parody of manners and habits.

But it would be tedious to draw out to the reader that which he will already have perceived better than myself I have no design to anticipate his reflections, and therefore shall only sketch the picture, which he must finish by himself he will pursue the subject forther, and form to himself a view of the common and domestick life of the 1themans, of which this kind of comedy was a picture, with some aggravation of the features he will bing within his view all the customs. manners, and vices and the whole character of the people of Athens By bringing all these together he will fix in his mind an indelible idea of a people in whom so many contrarieties were united, and who in a manner that can scarce be expressed connected nobility with the cast of Ithens, wisdom with madness, rage for novelty with a bigotry for intiquity the politeness of a monarchy with the roughness of a republick, refinemen with coarseness independence with slavery haughtiness with servile compliance, severity of manners with debauchers a kind of irre-We shall do this in reading ligion with piety travelling through different nations we make ourselves masters of their chanciers by combining their different appearances and reflecting upon what we see

III The government of Athen makes The govern-ment of the a fine part of the ancient comeds InAthenians most states the mystery of Lovernment is confined within the walls of the cabinets, even in commonwealths it does not pass but through five or six heads who rule those that think themselves the Orntory dares not touch it and comedy still Cicero himself did not speak freely upon so nice a subject as the Roman commonwealth but the Athenian eloqueice was informed of the whole secret and searches the recesses of the human mind. to fetch it out and expose it to the people thenes, and his contemporaries, speak with a freedom at which we are astonished, not withstanding the notion we have of a popular government, yet at what time but this did comedy adventure to claim the same rights with civil eloquence? The Italian comedy of the last age, all damg as it was, could for its boldness come into no competition with the ancient was limited to general satue, which was sometimes carried so far, that the malignity was overlooked in an attention to the wild exaggeration, the unexpected strokes, the pungent wit, and the malignity concealed under such wild flights as became the character of Harlegum But though it so fai resembled Aristophanes, our age is yet at a great distance from his, and the Italian comedy from his scenes with respect to the liberty of censuring the government, there can be no comparison made of one age or comedy with another Aristophanes is the only writer of his kind, and is for that reason of the highest value. A powerful state set at the head of Greece, is the subject of his meiriment, and that meiriment is allowed by the state itself. This appears to us an inconsistency; but it is true that it was the interest of the state to allow it, though not always without inconveniency It was a restraint upon the ambition and tyranny of single men, a matter of great importance to a people so very jealous of then liberty. Cleon, Alcibiades, Lamachus, and many other generals and magistrates, were kept under by fear of the comick strokes of a poet so little cautious as Aristophanes. He was once indeed in danger of paying dear for his wit He professed, as he tells us himself, to be of great use by his writings to the state, and rated his merit so high as to complain that he was not rewaided.

warded But, under pretence of this publick spirit, he spared no part of the publick conduct, neither was government, councils revenues, popular assemblies, secret proceedings in judicature, choice of ministers, the government of the nobles, or that of the people spared

The Acharmans, the Peace, and the Birds, are eter nal monuments of the boldness of the poet, who was not afraid of censuing the government for the obstinate continuance of a runous war, for undertaking new ones and feeding itself with wild imaginations, and running to destruction as it did for an idle point of honour

Nothing can be more reproachful to the Athenians than his play of the Knights, where he represents under an allegory that may be easily seen through, the nation of the Athenians as an old doting fellow tricked by a new man, such as Cleon and his companions, who were of the same stamp

A single glance upon Lysisti ata and the Female Orators must raise astonishment when the Athenian policy is set below the schemes of women, whom the author makes ridiculous for no other leason than to bring contempt upon their husbands, who held the helm of government

The Wasps is written to expose the midness of people for law suits and litigations and a multitude of iniquities are laid open

It may easily be gathered, that notwithstanding the wise laws of Solon, which they still professed to follow, the government was falling into decay for we are not o understand the jest of Aristophanes in the literal sense. It is plain that the corruption, though we should suppose it but half as much as we are told, was very great, for it ended in the destruction of Athens, which could scarce raise its head again, after it had been taken by Lysander Though we consider Aristophanes as a comick writer who deals in exaggeration, and bring down his stones to their true standard, we still find that the fundamentals of their government fail in almost all the essential points. That the people were invergled by men of ambition, that all councils and decrees had their original in factious combinations, that avarice and private interest animated all their policy to the huit of the publick; that then revenues were ill managed, then allies improperly treated; that then good citizens were sacrificed, and the bad put in places, that a mad eagerness for judicial litigation took up all their attention within, and that war was made without, not so much with wisdom and piecaution, as with tementy and good luck, that the love of novelty and fashion in the manner of managing the publick affairs was a madness universally prevalent, and that Melanthius says in Plutarch, the republick of Athens was continued only by the perpetual discord of those that managed its affairs This iemedied the dishonour by preserving the equilibrium, and was kept always in action by eloquence and comedy

This is what in general may be drawn from the reading Aristophanes. The sagacity of the readers will go faither they will compare the different forms of government by which that tumultuous people endeavoured to regulate or increase the democracy, which forms were all fatal to the state, because they were not built upon lasting foundations, and had all in them the principles of destruction. A strange contrivance it was to perpetuate a state by changing.

IV Another part of the works of The tragick At istophanes are his pleasant reflections upon the most celebrated poets, the shafts which he lets fly at the three heroes of tragedy und particularly at Europides, might incline the reader to believe that the had little esteem for those great men, and that probably the spectators that applieded him were of This conclusion would not be just as I his opinion have already shown by arguments, which, if I had not offered them the reader might have discovered better than I But that I may lette no room for objections and prevent any shadow of captiousness, I shall venture to observe, that posterity will not consider Racine as less a master of the Trench stage be cause his plays were ridiculed by parodies Parody always fixes upon the best pieces and was more to the taste of the Greeks than to ours At present the high thertres give it up to stages of inferior rink, but in Athens the comick the tire considered parody as its principal ornament, for are ison which is worth examining The incient comedy was not like ours, a seniote and delicate imitation, it was the ait of gross mimickry and would have been supposed to have missed its aim had it not copied the mien, the walk, the dress, the motions of the face of those whom it ex-Inbited Non parody is an imitation of this kind, it is a change of serious to builesque, by a slight variation of words, inflection of voice, or an imperceptible ait of mimickly Parody is to poetry as a masque As the tragedies of Eschylus, of Sophocles, and of Europides, were much in fashion, and were known by memory to the people, the parodies upon them would naturally strike and please, when they were accompanied by the grimaces of a good comedian, who mimicked with archness a serious cha-Such is the malignity of human nature; we love to laugh at those whom we esteem most, and by this make ourselves some recompense for the unwilling homage which we pay to ment The parodies upon these poets made by Aristophanes, ought to be considered rather as encomiums than satures give us occasion to examine whether the criticisms are just or not in themselves: but what is more important, they afford no proof that Euripides or his predecessors wanted the esteem of Aristophanes or his age. The statues laised to their honour, the respect paid by the Athenians to their writings, and the careful preservation of those writings themselves, are immortal testimonies in their favour, and make it unnecessary for me to stop any longer upon so plausible a solution of so frivolous an objection

Frequent reducule V. The most troublesome difficulty, of the gods and that which, so far as I know, has not yet been cleared to satisfaction, is the contemptuous manner in which Aristophanes treats the gods Though I am persuaded in my own mind that I have found the true solution of this question, I am not sure that it will make more impression than that of M. Bowin, who contents himself with saying, that every thing vas allowed to the comick poets, and that even Atheism was permitted to the licentious ness of the stage that the Athenians applauded all that made them laugh, and believed that Jupiter himself lauched with them at the smart sayings of a poet Mr Collier, an Englishman in his iemarks upon then stage attempts to prove that Aristophanes was an open Atheist For my part I am not satisfied with the account either of one or the other, and think it better to venture a new system, of which I have already dropt some hints in this work truth is that the Athenians professed to be great laughers, always ready for merriment on whatever subject But it cannot be conceived that Aristo phanes should without punishment, publish himself an A heist, unless we suppose that Atheism was the opinion likewise of the spectators, and of the judges commissioned to examine the plays and yet this cannot be suspected of those who boasted themselves the most religious nation and naturally the most superstitious of all Greece How can we suppose those to be Atheists who passed sentence upon Diagoras, So crates, and Alcibiades, for impiety? These are glaring inconsistencies To say like M Bowin, for sake of getting clear of the difficulty, that Alubiades, Sociates, and Diagoras, attacked religion seriously, and were therefore not allowed, but that Aristophanes did it in jest, or was authorized by custom would be to trifle with the difficulty and not to clear it. Though the Athenians loved merriment, it is not likely that if Aristophanes had professed Atheism they would have spared him more than Socrates, who had as much life and pleasantry in his discourses as the poet in his comedies The pungent raillery of Aristophanes, and the fondness of the Athenians for it, are therefore not the true reason why the poet was spared when Socrates was condemned. I shall now solve the question with great brevity.

The true answer to this question is given by Plutaich in his treatise of reading of the poets Plutaich attempts to prove that youth is not to be prohibited the reading of the poets, but to be cautioned against such parts as may have bad effects. They are first to be prepossesed with this leading principle, that poetry is false and fabulous. He then enumerates at length the fables which Homer and other poets have invented about their deities, and concludes thus "therefore there is found in poetical compositions any "thing strange and shocking, with respect to gods, or " demigods, or concerning the virtue of any excellent " and renowned characters, he that should receive "these fictions as truth would be corrupted by an " erroneous opinion: but he that always keeps in his "mind the fables and allusions, which it is the " business of poetry to contine, will not be injured " by these stories, nor i eceive any ill impressions upon " his thoughts, but will be ready to censure himself, " if at any time he happens to be afraid, lest Nep-" tune in his rage should split the earth, and lay open "the infernal regions" Some pages afterwards, he tells us, "That religion is a thing difficult of com-" prehension, and above the understanding of poets, " which it is," says he, " necessary to have in mind " when we read their fables"

The Pagans therefore had their fables, which they distinguished from their religion, for no one can be persuaded persuaded that Ocid intended his Metamorphoses as a true representation of the religion of the Romans. The poets were allowed their imaginations about their gods, as things which have no regard to the publick worship. Upon this principle, I say, as I said before, there was amongst the Pagans two sorts of religion, one a poetical, and a real religion one practical, the other theatrical a mythology for the poets, a theology for use. They had fables, and a worship which though founded upon fible, was not very different.

Diagoras, Socrates, Plato, and the philosophers of Athens, with Cicero, their admirer, and the other pretended wise men of Rome, are men by themselves. These were the Atheists with respect to the ancients. We must not therefore look into Plato, or into Cicero for the real religion of the Pagans as distinct from the fabrious. These two authors involve themselves in the clouds, that their opinions may not be discovered. They durst not openly attack the real religion, but destroyed it by attacking fable.

To distinguish here with exactne's the agreement or difference between fible and religion, is not at present my intention at is not easy to show with exactness what was the Athenian notion of the nature of the gods whom they worshipped Plutarch him self tells us, that this was a thing very difficult for the philosophers. It is sufficient for methat the mythology and theology of the uncents were different at the bottom, that the names of the gods continued the same, and that long custom give up one to the captices of the poets, without supposing the other affected by them This being once settled upon the authority of the ancients themselves, I am no longer surprised to see Jupiter, Minerva, Neptune, Bacchus, appear upon the stage in the comedy of Aristophanes, and at the same time receiving incense in the temples of Athens. This is, in my opinion, the most reasonable account of a thing so obscure; and I am ready to give up my system to any other, by which the Athenians shall be made more consistent with themselves; those Athenians who sat laughing at the gods of Aristophanes, while they condemned Sociates for having appeared to despise the gods of his country

VI A word is now to be spoken of The Mint and the Mimi, which had some relation to comedy This appellation was, by the Greeks and Romans, given to certain dramatic performances, and to the actors that played them The denomination sufficiently shows, that their art consisted in imitation and buffoonery Of their works, nothing, or very little, is remaining, so that they can only be con-- sidered by the help of some passages in authors: from which little is to be learned that deserves considera-I shall extract the substance, as I drd with respect to the chorus, without losing time, by defining all the different species, or producing all the quotations, which would give the reader more trouble than instruction. He that desires fuller instructions may read Vossius, Valois, Saumaises, and Gataher, of whose compilations, however learned, I should think it shame to be the author

The Mimi had then original from comedy, of which at its first appearance they made a part, for their mimick

mimick actors always played and exhibited grotesque dances in the comedies The jedousy of rivalship afterwards broke them off from the comick actors. and made them a company by themselves But to secure their reception, they borrowed from comedy all its drollery, wildness, grossness, and licentious ness This amusement they added to their dances and they produced what are now called farces or burlettas These furces had not the regularity or delicacy of comedies, they were only a succession of single scenes contrived to ruse laughter formed or unrayelled without order and without connection. They had no other end but to make the people laugh Now and then there might be good sentences, like the sentences of P Syrus, that are yet left us, but the groundwork was low comedy, and any thing of greater dignity drops in by chance We must how ever imagine, that this odd species of the drama rose at length to somewhat a higher character since we are told that Plato the philosopher laid the Mini of Sophron under his pillow, and they were found there after his death. But in general we may say with truth, that it always discovered the meanness of its original, like a filse pretension to nobility, in which the cheat is always discovered through the conceal ment of fictitious splendour

These Mini were of two sorts of which the length was different, but the purposes the same. The Mini of one species were short, those of the other long and not quite so grotesque. These two linds were subdivided into many species distinguished by the dresses and characters, such as show drunkards, physicius, men, and women.

Thus far of the Greeks—The Romans having borrowed of them the more noble shows of tragedy and comedy, were not content till they had their thapsodies—They had their planipedes, who played with flat soles, that they might have the more agality; and their Sanmons, whose head was shared, that they might box the better—There is no need of naming here all who had a name for these diversions among the Greeks and Romans—I have said enough, and perhaps too much of this abortion of comedy, which drew upon itself the contempt of good men, the censures of the magistrates, and the indignation of the fathers of the church.

Another set of players were called Pantomimes. these were at least so far preferable to the former, that they gave no offence to the cars. They spoke only to the eyes, but with such art of expression, that without the utterance of a single word, they represented, as we are told, a complete tragedy or comedy, in the same manner as dumb Harlequin is exhibited on our theatres These Pantomimes among the Greeks first mingled singing with their dances; afterwards, about the time of Livius Andronicus. the songs were performed by one part, and the dances by another. Afterwards, in the time of Augustus, when they were sent for to Rome, for the diversions of the people, whom he had enslaved, they played comedies without songs or vocal utterance; but by the sprightliness, activity, and efficacy of their restures, or, as Sidomus Apollinaris expressent, claufer faucibus, et loquente geflu, they not only exhibited things and passions, but even the most delicate distinctions of passions and the slightest circumstances of facts. We must not however makine at least in my opinion, that the Pantomimes did literally represent regular tragedies or comedies by the mere motions of their bodies. We may justly determine notwithstanding all their agality, their representations would at last be very incomplete vet we may suppo e, with good reason that their action was very In ely, and that the art of imitation went great lengths, since it raised the admiration of the wiest men, and made the people mad with eacerness. Yet when we read that one Hulus, the pupil of one Pulades in the time of Augustus divided the applicases of the people with his master, when they repre ented Oedipits, or when Jurenal tells us that Bathillus placed I eda and other things, of the same land, it is not easy to believe that a single man, without speaking a word, could exhibit tragedies of comedies, and make starts and bounds supply the place of vocal articulation Notwithstanding the obscurity of this whole inatter. one my know what to admit as Lertun or how for a representation could be carried by dance posture, and grimace. Among these artificial dance, of which we know nothing but the names, there was as early as the time of Iristophanes some extremely indecent These were continued in Italy from the time of Augustus long after the emperors. It was a publick mis cluef which contributed in some measure to the decay and rum of the Roman empne To have a due detestation of these licentious entertainments there is no need of any recourse to the fathers, the wiser Pagans tell us very plainly what they thought of them I have made this mention of the Minni and Pantonimes, only to show how the most noble of publick spectacles were corrupted and abused, and to conduct the reader to the end through every road, and through all the by-paths of human wit, from Homer and Eschylus to our own time.

VII That we may conclude this work Wanderings of the human by applying the principles laid down at mind in the birth and pio- the beginning, and extend it through gress of theathe whole, I desue the reader to recur trical repreto that point where I have represented sentations the human mind as beginning the course of the drama. The choius was first a hymn to Bucchus, produced by accident, ait brought it to perfection, and delight made it a publick diversion. Thespis made a single actor play before the people, this was the beginning of theatrical shows Eschylus, taking the idea of the Iliad and Odyssey, animated, if I may so express it, the epick poem, and gave a dialogue in place of simple recitation, puts the whole into action. and sets it before the eyes, as if it was a present and real transaction. he gives the chorus and interest in the scenes, contrives habits of dignity and theatrical decorations In a word, he gives both to tragedy; or, more properly, draws it from the bosom of the epick poem She made her appearance sparkling ^{*} Eschylus, in my opinion, as well as the other poets his contemporaries, retained the chorus, not merely because it was the fashion, but because examining tragedy to the bottom, they found it not rational to conceive, that an action great and splendid, like the revolution of a state, could pass without witnesses.

with graces, and displayed such majesty as gained every heart at the first view Sophocles considers her more nearly, with the eyes of a critick, and finds that she has something still about her rough and swelling he divests her of her false ornaments, teaches her a more regular walk, and more familiar dignity Luripides was of opinion, that she ought to receive still more softness and tenderness, he teaches her the new art of pleasing by simplicity, and gives her the chaims of graceful negligence, so that he makes her stand in suspense, whether she appears most to advantage in the dress of Sophocles sparkling with gems, or in that of Euripides, which is more simple and modest Both indeed ire elegant, but the elegance is of different kinds, between which no judgment as yet has decided the prize of superiority

We can now trace it no further its progress amongst the Griel's is out of sight. We must pass it once to the time of Augustus where Apollo and the Muses quitted their ancient residence in Greece to fix their abode in Italy. But it is vain to ask questions of Melpomene, she is obstinately silent, and we only know from strangers her power amongst the Romans. Seneca endeavours to make her speak, but the grady show with which he rather loads than adorus her, makes us think that he took some plan tom of Uclpomene for the Muse herself

Another flight, equally rapid with that to Rome, must carry us through thousands of years, from Rome to France. There in the time of Le vis XIV we see the mind of man giving birth to tragedy a second time as if the Greel tragedy had been utterly forgot. In the place of Exhylus, we have our Rotron. In Coincille we have another Sophocles, and in Racine a second Euripides. Thus is tragedy raised from her ashes, carried to the utmost point of greatness, and so dazzling that she prefers herself to herself Surprised to see herself produced again in France in so short a time, and nearly in the same manner as before in Greece, she is disposed to believe that her fate is to make a short transition from her birth to her perfection, like the goddess that issued from the brain of Jupiter.

If we look back on the other side to the rise of comedy, we shall see it hatched by Margites from the Odyssey of Homer, in imitation of her eldest sister; but we see her under the conduct of Aristophanes become licentious and petulant, taking airs to herself which the magistrates were obliged to crush mander reduced her to bounds, taught her at once gaicty and politeness, and enabled her to corsect vice, without shocking the offenders Plantus, among the Romans, to whom we must now pass, united the carlier and the later comedy, and joined buffoonery with delicacy Terence, who was better instructed, received comedy from Menander, and surpassed his original, as he endeavoured to copy it. And lastly, Moliere produced a new species of comedy, which must be placed in a class by itself, in opposition to that of Aristophanes, whose manner is likewisc peculiar to himself

But such is the weakness of the human mind, that when we review the successions of the drama a third time, we find genius falling from its height, forgetting itself, and led astray by the love of novelty, and the desire of striking out new paths. Tragedy degenerated in Greece from the time of Aristotle, and in Rome after Augustus At Rome and Athens comedy produced Mimi, pantomimes, burlettas tricks, and farces, for the sake of variety, such is the character, and such the madness of the mind of man It is entiefied with having made great conquests and gives them up to attempt others, which are fur from answering its expectation, and only enables it to discover its own folly, weakness, and deviations. But why should we be tired with standing still at the true point of perfection, when it is attuned? If eloquence be we will and forgets herself a while, yet she soon returns to her former point so will it happen to our theatres of the French Muses will keep the Greek models in their view, and not look with disdain upon a stage whose mother is nature, whose soul is passion and whose art is simplicity a stage which to speak the truth, does not perhaps equal ours in splendour and elevation but which excels it in simplicity and propriety, and equals it at least in the conduct and direction of those passions which may properly affect un honest man and a christian

For my part I shall think myself well recompensed for my labour, and shall attain the end which I had in view, if I shall in some little me is are revive in the minds of those who purpose to run the round of polite literature not an immoderate and blind reverence but a true taste of intiquity—such a taste as both feeds and polishes the mind—and enriches it by enabling it to appropriate the wealth of foreigness, and to evert its natural fertility in exquisite productions, such a taste as gave the Racines the Molieres the Boileaus, the Fontaines, the Patrus—the Pelessons, and many other great geniuses of the last age, all that they were, and all that they will always be, such a taste as puts the seal of immortality to those works in which it is discovered, a taste so necessary, that without it we may be certain that the greatest powers of nature will long continue in a state below themselves; for no man ought to allow himself to be flattered or seduced by the example of some men of genius, who have rather appeared to despise this taste than to despise it in reality. It is true that excellent originals have given occasion, without any fault of their own, to very bad copies No man ought severely to ape either the ancients or the moderns but if it was necessary to run into an extreme of one side or the other, which is never done by a judicious and well directed mind, it would be better for a wit, as for a painter, to enrich himself by what he can take from the ancients, than to grow poor by taking all from his own stock; or openly to affect an imitation of those moderns whose more fertile gennishas produced beauties peculiar to themselves, and which themselves only can display with grace. beauties of that peculiar kind, that they are not fit to be imitated by others, though in those who first invented them they may be justly esteemed, and in them only.

THE patronage of works which have a tendency towards advancing the happiness of mankind, naturally belongs to great Princes, and publick good, in which publick elegance is comprised, has ever been the object of your Majesty's regard

In the following pages your Majesty, I flatter myself, will find, that I have endeavoured at extensive and general usefulness. Knowing, therefore, your Majesty's early attention to the polite arts, and more particular affection for the study of architecture, I was encouraged to hope that the work which I now presume to lay before your Majesty, might be thought not unworthy your royal favour, and that the protection which your Majesty always affords to those who mean well, may be extended to,

Sın,

Ir is the privilege of real greatness not to be afraid of diminution by condescending to the notice of little things—and I therefore on boldly solicit the patronage of your Majesty to the humble labours by which I have endeavoured to improve the intruments of science, and make the globes on which the carth and sly are define ited less difficult in their construction, and less difficult in their use

Geography is in a peculiar manner the science of Princes. When a privite student revolves the terraqueous globe. In behold, a succession of countries in which he has no more interest than in the initial girary regions of Jupiter and Siturn. But your Majesty must contemplate the scientific picture with other sentiments and consider, as occasion and continents are rolling before you, how large a part of in in kind is now waiting on your determinations, and may acceive benefits or suffer earls, as your influence is a stended or withdrawn.

The provinces which your Myesty's rums have added to your dominions in he no inconsider the part of the oib allotted to human beings. Your power is acknowledged by nations whose no times we know not yet how to write and whose boundaries we cannot yet describe. But your Majesty's lently and beneficence give us reason to expect the time, when science shall be advanced by the diffusion of happiness, when the desarts of America shall, become pervious and safe when those who are now restrained by fe u, shall be happiness which was withheld from Tasso is reserved for me, and that the poem which once hardly procured to its author the countenance of the Princes of Ferrara, has attracted to its translator the favourable notice of a British Queen.

Had this been the fate of Tasso, he would have been able to have celebrated the condescension of your Majesty in nobler language, but could not have felt it with more aident gratitude, than,

Madam,

Your Majesty's most faithful and devoted Servant.

Di. James's Medicinal Dictionary.

To DR MEAD

Sir,

That the Medicinal Dictionary is dedicated to you, is to be imputed only to your reputation for superior skill in those sciences which I have endeavoured to explain and facilitate, and you are, therefore, to consider this address, if it be agreeable to you, as one of the rewards of merit, and if otherwise, as one of the inconveniencies of eminence.

However you shall receive it, my design cannot be disappointed, because this publick appeal to your judgment will show that I do not found my hopes of approbation upon the ignorance of my readers, and that I fear his censure least, whose knowledge is most extensive.

I am Sir, Your most obedient humble Servant, R. JAMES. The TEMALF QUILOTE By Mrs LENON 1752 To the Rt Hon the Earl of Mipplesry

My LORD.

Such is the power of interest over almost every mind, that no one is long without arguments to prove any position which is ardently wished to be true, or to justify any measures which are dictated by in clination

By this subtil sophistry of desire, I have been persuaded to hope that this book may, without impropriety, be inscribed to your Lordship but am not certain that my reasons will have the same force upon other understandings

The dread which a writer feels of the public cen sure, the still greater diead of neglect and the eager wish for support and protection which is impressed by the consciousness of imbecility, are unknown to those who have never adventured into the world, and I am afraid, my lord equally unknown to those who have always found the world ready to applied them

Tis therefore not unlikely that the design of this address may be mistaken, and the effects of my fear imputed to my vanity They who see your loadship s name prefixed to my performance will rather condemn my presumption than compassionate my anxiety

But whatever be supposed my motive the praise of judgment cannot be denied me for, to whom can timidity so properly fly for shelter, as to him who has been so long distinguished for candour and humanity? How can vanity be so compleatly gratified as by the allowed patronage of him, whose judgment has so long given a standard to the national taste? Or by what what other means could I so powerfully suppress all opposition, but that of envy, as by declaring myself, My Loid,

Your Lord-hip's obliged and most obedient Servant, '.

The AUTHOR

SHAKESPLAR Illustrated, or, The Novels and Histories on which the Plays of Shakesplar are founded, collected and translated from the original authors. With Critical Remarks. By the Author of the Flyale Quinoil 1753

To the Right Hon John, Earl of ORRLRY. My LORD,

I HAVE no other pretence to the honour of a patronage so illustrious as that of your lordship, than the ment of attempting what has by some unaccountable neglect been hitherto omitted, though absolutely necessary to a perfect knowledge of the abilities of Shakespear

Among the powers that must conduce to constitute a poet, the first and most valuable is invention, the highest seems to be that which is able to produce a series of events. It is easy when the thread of a story is once drawn, to diversify it with variety of colours, and when a train of action is presented to the mind, a little acquaintance with life will supply circumstances and reflections, and a little knowledge of books furnish parallels and illustrations. To tell over again a story that has been told already, and to tell it better than the first author, is no rare qualification, but to strike out the first hints of a new fable: hence to introduce a set of characters so diversified in their several passions and interests that from the clashing of this variety may result many necessary incidents—to make these incidents surprizing, and yet natural, so as to delight the imagination without shocking the judgment of a reader, and finally to wind up the whole in a pleasing catastrophic produced by those very means which seem most likely to oppose and prevent it, is the utmost effort of the human mind

To discover how few of those writers who profess to recount innaming adventures have been able to produce any thing by their own innamiation, would require too much of that time which your lordship employs in nobler studies. Of all the novels and romances that wit or idleness, wanty or indigence, have pushed into the world there are very few of which the end cannot be conjectured from the beginning or where the authors have done more than to transpose the incidents of other tales or strip the circumstances from one event for the decoration of another

In the examination of a poet's character it is therefore first to be inquired what degree of invention has been exerted by him. With this view I have very diligently read the works of Shal espear, and now presume to by the result of my searches before your loudnip before that judge whom Pliny himself would have wished for his assessor to hear a literary cause

How much the translation of the following novels will add to the reputation of Shakespear or take away from it, you my lord, and men learned and candid like you, if any such can be found, must now determine Some danger, I am informed there is, less his admirers should think him injured by this attempt, and clamour as at the diminution of the honour of that nation which boasts itself the parent of so great a poet

That no such enemies may an seagainst me (though I am unwilling to believe it) I am far from being too confident, for who can fix bounds to bigotry and folly? My sev, my age, have not given me in my opportunties of mingling in the world—there may be in it many a species of absurdity which I have never seen, and among them such vanity as pleases itself with false praise bestowed on another, and such superstition as worships idols, without supposing them to be gods

But the truth is, that a very small part of the reputation of this mighty genius depends upon the naked plot or story of his plays. He had in an age when the books of chivalry were yet popular, and when therefore the minds of his auditors were not accustomed to balance probabilities, or to examine nicely the proportion between causes and effects. It was sufficient to recommend a story, that it was far removed from common life, that its changes were frequent, and its close pathetic

This disposition of the age concurred so happily with the imagination of Shakespear, that he had no desire to reform it, and indeed to this he was indebted for the licentious variety, by which he made his plays more entertaining than those of any other author

He had looked with great attention on the scenes of nature but his chief skill was in human actions, passions, and habits he was therefore delighted with such tales as afforded numerous incidents, and exhibited many characters in many changes of situation. These characters characters are so copiously diversified, and some of them so justly pursued that his works may be con sidered as a map of life, a furthful miniature of human transactions, and he that has read Shakespear with attention will perhaps find little new in the crouded world

Among his other excellencies it ought to be re marked, because it has hitherto been unnoticed that his heroes are men, that the love and hatred, the hopes and fears of his chief personages are such as are common to other human beings and not like those which later times have exhibited, peculiar to phantoms that strut upon the stage

It is not perhaps very necessary to inquire whether the vehicle of so much delight and instruction be a story probable or unlikely native or foreign. Shakespear is excellence is not the fiction of a tale but the representation of life and his reputation is therefore safe, till hum in nature shall be changed. Nor can he, who has so many just claims to praise suffer by losing that which ignorant admiration has unreasonably given him. To calumniate the dead is baseness, and to flatter them is surely folly.

From flattery my lord, either of the dead or the living, I wish to be clear, and have therefore solicited the countenance of a patron whom if I knew how to praise him I could praise with truth and have the world on my side whose candour and humanity are universally acknowledged, and whose judgment per haps was then first to be doubted when he con descended to admit this address from,

My Lord,

Your Lordship s most obliged and most obedient humble Servant, The AUTHOR may be delivered to our enemies, or abandoned to that discord, which must mevitably prevail among men that have lost all sense of divine superintendence, and have no higher motive of action or forbearance, than present opinion of present interest

It is the duty of private men to supplicate and propose, it is yours to hear and to do right. Let religion be once more restored, and the nation shall once more be great and happy. This consequence is not far distant: that nation must always be powerful where every man performs his duty, and every man will perform his duty that considers himself as a being whose condition is to be settled to all eternity by the laws of Chreet.

The only doctrine by which man can be made wise unto salvation, is the will of God, revealed in the books of the old and the New Testament

To study the scriptures, therefore, according to his abilities and attainments, is every man's duty, and to facilitate that study to those whom nature hath made weak, or education has left ignorant, or indispensable cares detain from regular processes of inquiry, is the business of those who have been blessed with abilities and learning, and are appointed the instructors of the lower classes of men, by that common father, who distributes to all created beings their qualifications and employments, who has allotted some to the labour of the hand, and some to the exercise of the mind, has commanded some to teach, and others to learn, has prescribed to some the patience of instruction, and to others the meckness of obedience.

By what methods the uncollightened and ignorant may be made proper readers of the word of God, has been long and diligently considered. Commentaries of all kinds have indeed been copiously produced but there still remain multitudes to whom the labours of the learned are of little use, for whom expositions require an expositor. To those, indeed, who read the divine books without vain curiosity, or a desire to be wise beyond their powers it will always be easy to discern the strait path, to find the words of everlasting life. But such is the condition of our nature, that we are always attempting what it is difficult to perform he who reads the scripture to gain goodness, is desirous likewise to gain knowledge, and by his impatience of ignorance falls into errour

This danger has appeared to the doctors of the Romish church, so much to be feared, and so difficult to be escaped that they have snatched the Bible out of the hands of the people, and confined the liberty of perusing it to those whom literature has previously qualified. By this expedient they have formed a kind of uniformity, I am afrud too much like that of colours in the dark. But they have certainly usurped a power which God has never given them, and precluded great numbers from the highest spiritual consolution.

Iknownot whether this prohibition has not brought upon them an evil which they themselves have not discovered. It is graited I believe by the Romanists themselves, that the best commentaries on the Bible have been the works of Protestants. I know not, indeed, whether since the celebrated paraphrale of Erasmus, any scholar has appeared amongst them, whose, works are much valued, even in his own communion. Why have the cube excel in every other Vol. III.

kind of knowledge, to whom the world owes much of the increase of light which has shone upon these latter ages, failed, and failed only when they have attempted to explain the scriptures of God? Why, but because they are in the church less read and less examined, because they have another rule of deciding controversies, and instituting laws

Of the Bible some of the books are prophetical, some doctimal and historical, as the gospels, of which we have in the subsequent pages attempted an illustration. The books of the evangelists contain an account of the life of our blessed Saviour, more particularly of the years of his ministry, interspersed with his precepts, doctrines, and predictions. Each of these histories contain facts and dictates related likewise in the rest, that the truth might be established by concurrence of testimony, and each has likewise facts and dictates which the rest omit, to prove that they were wrote without communication.

These writers not affecting the exactness of chronologers, and relating various events of the same life, or the same events with various circumstances, have some difficulties to him, who, without the help of many books, desires to collect a series of the acts and precepts of Jesus Christ, fully to know his life, whose example was given for our imitation, fully to understand his precepts, which it is sure destruction to disobey.

In this work, therefore, an attempt has been made, by the help of harmonists and expositors, to reduce the four gospels into one series of narration, to form a complete history out of the different narratives of the evangelists, by insciting every event in the order of time, and connecting every precept of life and doctrine, with the occasion on which it was delivered, showing as fir as history or the knowledge of ancient customs can inform us the reason and propriety of every action and explaining or endeavouring to explain, every precept and declaration in its true meaning

Let it not be ha tily concluded, that we intend to substitute this book for the gospels or obtrude our own expositions as the orricles of God We recommend to the unlearned reader to consult us when he finds any difficulty as men who have laboured not to deceive ourselves and who are without any temp tation to deceive him but as men, however, that, while they mean best may be mistaken. Let him be careful therefore, to distinguish what we cite from the gospels, from what we offer as our own he will find many difficulties removed, and if some yet remain let him remember that God is in heaven and or upon earth, that our thoughts are not God's thoughts, and that the great cure of doubt is an humble mind

THE improvement of aits and sciences has always been esteemed laudable, and in proportion to their utility and advantage to mankind, they have generally gained the pationage of persons the most distinguished for bith, learning, and reputation in the world This is an art undoubtedly of public utility, and which has been cultivated by persons of distinguished abilities, as will appear from its history. But as most of then systems have been defective, clogged with a multiplicity of rules, and perplexed by arbitrary, intricate, and impracticable schemes, I have endeavoured to rectify their defects, to adapt it to all capacities, and render it of general, lasting, and extensive benefit How this is effected the following plates will sufficiently explain, to which I have prefixed a suitable introduction, and a concise and impartial history of the origin and progressive improvements of this ait And as I have submitted the whole to the inspection of accurate judges, whose approbation I am honoured with, I most humbly crave leave to publish it to the world under your Grace's pationage, not merely on account of your great dignity and high rank in life, though these receive a lustie from your Grace's humanity, but also from a knowledge of your Grace's disposition to encourage every useful art, and favour all true promoters of science That your Grace may long live the friend of learning, the guardian of liberty, and the patron of virtue, and then transmit your name with the highest honour and esteem to late t posterity. is the aident wish of

BARETTI'S DICTION ARYOF the ENGLISH AND ITALIAN LANGUAGES 2 Vols 4 1760

To his Excellency Don Telly, Marquis of Abreu and BERTODANO, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plempotentiary from his Catholic Majesty to the King of Great Britain

My LORD

That acuteness of penetiation into characters and designs, and that nice discernment of human passions and practices which have raised you to your present height of station and dignity of employment, have long shown you that dedicatory addresses are written for the sake of the author more frequently than of the patron, and though they profess only reverence and zeal, are commonly dictated by interest or a units

I shall therefore not endeavour to conceal my motives but confess that the Italian Dictionary is dedicated to your Excellency that I might gratify my vanity, by making it known, that in a country where I am a stranger, I have been able, without any external external recommendation, to obtain the notice and counterance of a nobleman so eminent for knowledge and ability, that in his twenty-third year he was sent as Plempotentiary to superintend, at Aix-la-Chapelle, the interests of a nation remarkable above all others for gravity and prudence: and who at an age, when very few are admitted to publick trust, transacts the most important affairs between two of the greatest monarchs of the world

If I could attribute to my own merits the favours which your Excellency every day confers upon me, I know not how much my pride might be inflamed; but when I observe the extensive benevolence and boundless liberality by which all who have the honour to approach you, are dismissed more happy than they come, I am afraid of raising my own value, since I date not ascribe it so much to my power of pleasing as your willingness to be pleased.

Yet as every man is inclined to flatter himself, I am desirous to hope that I am not admitted to greater intimacy than others without some qualifications for so advantageous a distinction, and shall think it my duty to justify, by constant respect and sincerity, the favours which you have been pleased to show me.

I am, my Lord,

Your Excellency's most humble and most obedient Servant,

The English Works of Roger Aschan, edited by James Bennet 4 1767

To the Right Hon ANTHON ASHIFY COOPER, Earl of Shaffi shury, Baron Ashley, Lord I leutenant and Custos Rotularum of Dorsetshire, f r s

My LORD,

Ilavino endervoured, by an elegant and useful edition, to recover the esteem of the Publick to an Author undescriedly neglected, the only care which I now owe to his memory, is that of inscribing his works to a patron whose acknowledged eminence of character may awaken attention and attract regard

I have not suffered the zeal of an editor so far to take possession of my mind, as that I should obtrude upon your Lordship any productions unsuitable to the dignity of your rank or of your sentiments. Ascham was not only the chief ornament of a celebrated college, but visited foreign countries frequented courts, and lived in familiarity with statesmen and princes, not only instructed scholars in literature, but formed Litz verth to empire

To propagate the works of such a writer will not be unworthy of your Lordship's patriotism for I know not what greater benefits you can confer on your country, than that of preserving worthy names from oblivion, by joining them with your own

PREFACE to "New Tables of Interest. Designed to answer, in the most correct and expeditious manner, the common purposes of business, particularly the business of the Public Funds By John Payne, of the Bank of England" 1758

Among the writers of fiction, whose business is to furnish that entertainment which fancy perpetually demands, it is a standing plea, that the beauties of nature are now exhausted that imitation has exerted all its power, and that nothing more can be done for the service of their mistress, than to exhibit a perpetual transposition of known objects, and draw new pictures, not by introducing new images, but by giving new lights and shades, a new arrangement and colouring to the old. This plea has been cheerfully admitted and fancy, led by the hand of a skilful guide, treads over again the flowery path she has often tool before, as much enamoured with every new diversification of the same prospect, as with the first appearance of it.

In the regions of science, however, there is not the same indulgence the understanding and the judgment travel there in the pursuit of truth, whom they always expect to find in one simple form, free from the disguises of dress and ornament, and, as they travel with laborious step and a fixed eye, they are content to stop when the shades of night darken the prospect, and patiently wait the radiance of a new morning, to lead them forward in the path they have chosen, which, however thorny, or however steep, is severely preferred to the most pleasing excursions that bring them no nearer to the object of their search. The plea, therefore, fore that nature is exhausted, and that nothing is left to gratify the mind, but different combinations of the same ideas, when urged as a reason for multiplying unnecessity labours among the sons of science. is not so readily admitted the understanding, when in possession of truth, is attisfied with the simple acquisition, and not like fancy, inclined to wander after new pleasures in the diversification of objects already known which, perhaps, may lead to errour

But notwithst inding this general disinclination to accumulate labours for the sake of that pleasure which arises merely from different modes of investigating truth, yet, as the mines of science have been diligently opened, and their treasures widely diffused, there may be parts chosen, which by a proper combination and arrangement, may contribute not only to entertunment but use like the rays of the sun, collected in a concave mirror, to serve particular purposes of light and heat

The power of arithmetical numbers has been tried to a vast extent, and variously applied to the improve ment both of business and science In particular, o many calculations have been made with respect to the value and use of money, that some serve only for specultion and amusement and there is great opportunity for selecting a few that are peculiarly adapted to common busines, and the duly interchanges of property imong men. Those which happen in the Publick Funds ire it this time the mo thequent and and to inswer the purpo es of that busi ness in some degree more perfectly than has latherto been done the following tables are published What that degree of perfection above other tables of the same kind may be, is a matter, not of opinion and taste, in which many might vary, but of accuracy and usefulness, with respect to which most will agree. The approbation they meet with will, therefore, depend upon the experience of those for whom they were principally designed, the proprietors of the publick funds, and the brokers who transact the business of the funds, to whose pationage they are cheerfully committed

Among the Brokers of Stocks are men of great honour and probity, who are candid and open in all their transactions, and incapable of mean and selfish purposes. and it is to be lamented, that a market of such importance as the present state of this nation has made theirs, should be brought into any discredit, by the intrusion of bad men, who, instead of serving their country, and procuring an honest subsistence in the army or the fleet, endeavour to maintain luxurious tables, and splendid equipages, by sporting with the publick credit

It is not long since the evil of stock-jobbing was risen to such an enormous height, as to threaten great injury to every actual proprietor—particularly to many widows and orphans, who, being bound to depend upon the funds for their whole subsistence, could not possibly retreat from the approaching danger. But this evil, after many unsuccessful attempts of the legislature to conquer it, was, like many others, at length subdued by its own violence, and the reputable Stock-brokers seem now to have it in their power effectually to prevent its return, by not suffering the most distant approaches of it to take footing in their own practice, and by opposing every effort effort made for its recovery by the desperate sons of fortune, who, not having the courage of highwaymen take 'Change Alley rather than the road, because, though more injurious than highwaymen, they are less in danger of punishment by the loss either of liberty or life

With respect to the other pitrons to whose encouragement these Tables have been recommended, the proprietors of the public funds, who are busy in the improvement of their fortunes, it is sufficient to say—that no motive can sanctify the accumulation of wealth, but an ordent desire to make it e most honourable and virtuous use of it, by contributing to the support of good government, the increase of arts and industry, the rewards of genius and virtue, and the relief of wretchedness and want

What Good, what True what Fit we justly call, Let this be all our care—for this is All, To by this Treasure up, and hoard with haste What ev ry day will want, and most the last This done, the poorest can no wants endure And this not done, the richest must be poor

r 100 a benevolent disposition every state of life will afford some opportunities of contributing to the welfare of mankind. Opulence and splendor are enabled to dispel the cloud of adversity, to dry up the tears of the widow and the orphan, and to increase the felicity of all around them, their example

The of these papers Aos 39 6, 74 81 and 1 a are now re tored to this edition of Dr John ons works. will animate tiltue, and retaid the progress of vice And even indigence and obscurity, though without power to confer happiness, may at least prevent misery, and apprize those who are blinded by their passions, that they are on the brink of irremediable calamity.

Pleased, therefore, with the thought of recovering others from that folly which has embittered my own days, I have presumed to address the Adventurer from the dreary mansions of wretchedness and despan, of which the gates are so wonderfully constructed, as to fly open for the reception of strangers, though they are impervious as a rock of adamant to such as are within them:

> Tacilis descensus Areini, Noctes atque dies patet atri janua Ditis Sed revocare gradum, superasque eradere ad aures, Hoc opus hic labor est Ving.

The gates of Hell are open night and day; Smooth the descent, and easy is the way. But to return and view the checiful skies. In this the task and mighty labour lies DRYDEY.

Suffer me to acquaint you, Sir, that I have ghttered at the ball, and sparkled in the circle, that I have had the happiness to be the unknown favourite of an unknown lady at the masquerade, have been the delight of tables of the first fashion, and envy of my brother beaux, and to descend a little lower, it is, I believe, still remembered, that Messis Velouis and d'Espagne stand indebted for a great part of their pre entinfluence at Guildhall, to the elegance of my shipe, and the graceful freedom of my cirrage

Sed que praedara et pros, era terti Ut relus letus par ait mensura malorum! Jes See the will purch —e of the leld and va n Where every bliss is bought with equal pun?

As I entered into the world very young with an elegant person and a large estate it was not long be fore I di entangled my ell from the shield of religion for I was determined to the pursuit of pleasur, which according to my notions con i ted in the uncertained and unlimited gratification of every passon and every appetite, and as this could not be obtained under the from sof a perpetual dictator, I considered religion as my enemy and proceeding to treat her with contempt, and derision was not a little delighted, that the unfalionable ices of her appearance, and in minimated uniformity of her motions, ifforded frequent opportunities for the sallies of my imagination.

Concerning now that I was sufficiently qualified to laugh away scruple, I imparted my remarks to those among my female futurities who e virtue I intended to attack, for I was well as used, that pride would be able to make but a weak defence, when religion was subverted, nor was my success below my expectation, the love of pleasure is too strongly implanted in the female breast, to suffer them serulated in the female breast, to suffer them serulated to weaken restraint, all are easily led to believe, that whatever this atts their inclination must be wrong thitle more, therefore, was required, than by the addition of some circumstances, and the exaggeration of others, to make merriment supply the place of demonstration; nor was I so senseless as to offer arguments to such as could not attend to them, and with whom a repartee or eatch would more effectually answer the same purpose. This being effected, there remained only "the dread of the world but Rorana socied too high, to think the opinion of others worthy her notice. Lectitia seemed to think of it only to declare, that "if all her hans were worlds," she should reckon them "well lost for love;" and Pastorella fondly conceived, that she could dwell for ever by the side of a bubbling fountain, content with her swain and fleecy care; without considering that stillness and solitude can afford satisfaction only to innocence

It is not the desire of new acquisitions, but the glory of conquests, that fires the soldier's breast; as indeed the town is seldom worth much, when it has suffered the devastations of a siege, so that though I did not openly declare the effects of my own prowess, which is foibidden by the laws of honour, it cannot be supposed that I was very solicitous to bury my reputation, or to hinder accidental discoveries. To have gained one victory, is an inducement to hazard a second engagement and though the success of the general should be a reason for increasing the strength of the fortification, it becomes, with many, a pretence for an immediate surrender, under the notion that no power is able to withstand so 'formidable an adversary, while others brave the danger, and think it mean to surrender, and dastardly to fly. Melissa, indeed, knew better;

and though she could not boast the apathy, steadiness, and inflexibility of a Cato, wanted not the more prudent virtue of Scipio, and gained the victory by declining the contest

You must not, however, imagine, that I was. during this state of abandoned libertinism, so fully convinced of the fitness of my own conduct, as to be free from une isiness I knew very well, that I might justly be deemed the pest of society, and that such proceedings must terminate in the destruction of my health and fortune, but to admit thoughts of this kind was to live upon the rack. I fled, therefore, to the regions of mirth and jollity, as they are called, and endersoured with burgundy and a continual rotation of company to free myself from the pangs of reflection From these orgies we frequently sallied forth in quest of adventures, to the no smill terrour and consternation of all the sober strugglers that came in our way and though we never injured, like our illustrious progenitors, the Molocks, either life or limbs, yet we have in the midst of Cocent Garden buried a tailor, who had been troublesome to some of our fine gentlemen, beneath a heap of cabbageleaves and stalks, with this conceit

paid for an hundred times. or their appearances with patches on their heads, under pietchee of being cut by the sword that was never drawn · nor need I say any thing of the more formidable attack of sturdy channen, aimed with poles, by a slight stroke of which, the pilde of Ned Revel's face was at once laid flat, and that effected in an instant, which its most mortal foe had for years assayed in vain I shall pass over the accidents that attended attempts to scale windows, and endcavours to dislodge signs from their hooks: there are many "hair-breadth 'scapes" besides those in the "imminent deadly breach," but the rake's life, though it be equally hazardous with that of the soldier, is neither accompanied with piesent honour nor with pleasing ietrospect; such is, and such ought to be the difference, between the enemy and the preserver of his country

Amidst such giddy and thoughtless extravagance, it will not seem strange, that I was often the dupe of coarse flattery When Mons L'Allonge assured me that I thrust quart over arm better than any man in England, what could I less than present him with a sword that cost me thirty pieces? I was bound for a hundred pounds for Tom Trippet, because he had declared that he would dance a minuet with any man in the three kingdoms except myself. But I often parted with money against my inclination, either because I wanted the resolution to refuse, or dreaded the appellation of a niggardly fellow, and I may be tiuly said to have squandered my estate, without honour, without friends, and without pleasure last may, perhaps, appear strange to men unacquainted with the masquerade of life: I deceived others.

others, and I endeavoured to deceive myself, and have worn the face of pleasantry and gayety, while my heart suffered the most exquisite tortune

By the instigation and encouragement of my friends, I became at length ambitious of a sent in pulliament, and accordingly set out for the town of H allop in the west, where my arrival was welcomed by a thousand throats, and I was in three days sure of a majority but after drinking out one hundled and fifty hogsheads of wine, and bribing two thirds of the corporation twice over, I had the mortification to find that the borough had been before sold to Mr Courtly

In a life of this kind my fortune, though considerable was presently dissipated and as the attraction grows more strong the nearer any body approaches the earth, when once a man begins to sink into poverty he falls with velocity always increasing every supply is purchased at a higher and higher price, and every office of kindness obtained with greater and greater difficulty. Having now acquainted you with my state of elevation I shall if you encourage the continuance of my correspondence show you by what steps I descended from a first floor in Pall Mall to my present hibitation.

I am, SIR

Your humble servant

Ir every day did not produce fiesh instances of the ingratitude of mankind, we might, perhaps, be at a loss, why so liberal and impartial a benefactor as Sleep, should meet with so few historians or panegy-iists. Writers are so totally absorbed by the business of the day, as never to turn their attention to that power, whose officious hand so seasonably suspends the burthen of life, and without whose interposition, man would not be able to endure the fatigue of labour, however rewarded, or the struggle with opposition, however successful

Night, though she divides to many the longest part of life, and to almost all the most innocent and happy, is yet unthankfully neglected, except by those v ho pervert her gifts

The astronomers, indeed, expect her with impatience, and felicitate themselves upon her arrival; Fontenelle has not failed to colebrate her praises, and to chide the sun for hiding from his view the worlds, which he imagines to appear in every constellation. Nor have the poets been always deficient in her praises Milton has observed of the Night, that it is 'the pleasant time, the cool, the silent'

These men may, indeed well be expected to pay particular homage to Night, since they are indebted to her, not only for cessation of pain, but increase of pleasure, not only for slumber, but for knowledge But the greater part of her avowed votaries are the sons of luxury, who appropriate to festivity the hours designed for rest, who consider the reign of pleasure as commencing, when day begins to withdraw her busy multitudes, and ceases to dissipate attention by intrusive and unwelcome viriety, who begin to awake to joy when the rest of the world sinks into insensibility, and revel in the soft affluence of flattering and artificial lights, which 'more shindowy set off the face of things '

Without touching upon the fital consequences of a custom which, as Ramazzim observes, will be for ever condemned and for ever retained at may be observed, that however Sleep may be put off from time to time, yet the demand is of so importunate a nature, as not to remain long unsatisfied and if, as some have done, we consider it as the tax of life, we cannot but observe it as a tax that must be paid, unless we could cease to be men, for Alexander declared that nothing convinced him that he was not a divinity but his not being able to live without sleep

To live without sleep in our present fluctuating state however desirable it might seem to the lady in Cleha can surely be the wish only of the young or the ignorant, to every one else, a perpetual vigil will appear to be a state of wretchedness second only to that of the miserable beings, whom Souft has in his travel travels so elegantly described, as 'supremely cursed with immortality'

Sleep is necessary to the happy, to prevent satiety, and to endear life by a short absence, and to the miserable, to relieve them by intervals of quiet. Life is to most, such as could not be endured without frequent intermission of existence. Homer, therefore, has thought it an office worthy of the goddess of wisdom, to lay Ulysses asleep when landed on Phæacia.

It is related of Barretier, whose early advances in literature scarce any human mind has equalled, that he spent twelve hours of the four-and-twenty in sleep yet this appears from the bad state of his health, and the shortness of his life, to have been too small a respite for a mind so vigorously and intensely employed it is to be regretted, therefore, that he did not exercise his mind less, and his body more. since by this means, it is highly probable, that though he would not then have astonished with the blaze of a comet, he would yet have shone with the permanent radiance of a fixed star

Nor should it be objected, that there have been many men who daily spend fifteen or sixteen hours in study for by some of whom this is reported, it has never been done, others have done it for a short time only, and of the rest it appears, that they employed their minds in such operations as required neither celerity nor strength, in the low drudgery of collating copies, comparing authorities, digesting dictionaries, or accumulating compilations

Men of study and imagination are frequently upbraided by the industrious and plodding sons of care, with passing too great a part of their life in a state of maction. nnction But these defiers of sleep seem not to remember, that though it must be granted them that they are crawling about before the break of day it can seldom be said that they are perfectly as ike, they exhaust no spirits, and require no repairs, but he torpid as a toad in mable, or at least we known to live only by an inert and sluggish loco motive ficulty, and may be said, like a wounled sinke, to add their slow length along?

Man has been long known among philosophers, by the appellation of the microcosm, or epitome of the the resemblance between the prest and little world might, by a rational observer, be detailed to many particulars, and to many more by a fanciful speculatist I know not in which of these two classes I shall be ranged for observing that as the total quan tity of hight and darkness allotted in the course of the year to every region of the earth is the same, though distributed at various times and in different portions. so perhaps, to each individual of the human species, nature has ordained the same quantity of wakefulness and sleep, though divided by some into a total quiescence and vigorous exertion of their faculties, and blended by others in a kind of twilight of existence, in a state between dreaming and reasoning in which they either think without action, or act with out thought

The poets are generally well affected to sleep—as men who think with vigour, they require respite from thought, and gladly resign themselves to that gentle power, who not only bestows rest, but frequently leads them to happier regions, where patrons are always kind, and audiences are always candid, where they are feasted in the bowers of imagination, and crowned with flowers divested of their piickles, and laurels of unfading verdure

The more refined and penetrating part of mankind, who take wide surveys of the wilds of life, who see the innumerable terrours and distresses that are perpetually preying on the heart of man, and discern with unhappy perspicuity, calamities yet latent in their causes, are glad to close their eyes upon the gloomy prospect, and lose in a short insensibility the remembrance of others miseries and their own The hero has no higher hope, than that, after having routed legions after legions, and added kingdom to kingdom, he shall retire to milder happiness, and close his days in social festivity The wit or the sage can expect no greater happiness, than that, after having harassed his reason in deep researches, and fatigued his fancy in boundless excursions, he shall sink at night in the tranquillity of sleep

The poets, among all those that enjoy the blessings of sleep, have been least ashamed to acknowledge their benefactor. How much Statius considered the evils of life as assuaged and softened by the balm of slumber, we may discover by that pathetic invocation, which he poured out in his waking nights and that Cowley, among the other felicities of his darling solitude, did not forget to number the privilege of sleeping without disturbance, we may learn from the rank that he assigns among the gifts of nature to the poppy, 'which is scattered,' says he, ' over the fields of corn, that all the needs of man may be easily satisfied, and that bread and sleep may be found together.'

Si quis incisum Cereri benignæ
Me putat germen, vehementer errat,
Illa me in partem recipit libenter
Tertilis agri

Meque frumentumque simul per omnes Consulens mundo Dea spargit oras Crescite, O' dixit, duo magna susten tacula vitæ

Carpe mortalis mea dona lætus
Carpe, nec plantas alias require,
Sed satur pams, satur et soporis,
Cætera sperne

He wildly errs who thinks I yield Precedence in the well cloth d field, Tho mix d with wheat I grow Indulgent Ceres knew my worth And to adorn the teeming earth, She bade the Poppy blow

Nor vainly gay the sight to please, But blest with power mankind to ease, The goddess saw me rise 'Thrive with the life supporting grain,' She cried the soluce of the swain, The cordial of his eyes

'Seize, happy mortal seize the good, My hand supplies thy sleep and food, And makes thee truly blee. With plenteous meals enjoy the day, In slumbers pass the night away, And leave to fate the rest

Sleep, therefore, as the chief of all earthly blessings, is justly appropriated to industry, and temperance; the refreshing rest, and the peaceful night, are the pertion only of him who lies down weary with honest labour, and free from the fumes of indigested luxury; it is the just doom of laziness and gluttony, to be inactive without ease, and drow sy without tranquility

Sleep has been often mentioned as the image of death, 'so like it,' says Sn Thomas Brown, 'that I dare not trust it without my prayers' their resemblance is, indeed, apparent and striking, they both, when they seize the body, leave the soul at liberty: and wise is he that remembers of both, that they can be safe and happy only by virtue.

SIR, Fleet, March 24

I now send you the sequel of my story, which had not been so long delayed, if I could have brought my self to imagine that any real impatience was felt for the fate of Mysargyrus who has travelled no unbeaten track to misery, and consequently can present the reader only with such incidents as occur in daily life

You have seen me Sir, in the zenith of my glory, not dispensing the kindly warmth of an all cheering sun, but, like mother Phacton scorching and blast ing every thing round me I shall proceed, therefore, to finish my career, and pass as rapidly as possible through the remaining vicisitudes of my life

When I first began to be in want of money, I made no doubt of an immediate supply The newspapers were perpetually offering directions to men, who seemed to have no other business than to gather heaps of gold for those who place their supreme felicity in scattering it. I posted away, therefore, to one of these advertisers, who by his proposals seemed to deal in thousands, and was not a little chagrined to find, that this general benefactor would have nothing to do with any larger sum than thirty pounds, nor would venture that without a joint note from myself and a reputable housekeeper, or for a longer time than three months

It was not yet so bad with me, as that I needed to solicit surety for thirty pounds: yet partly from the greediness that extravagance always produces, and partly from a desire of seeing the humour of a petty usurer, a character of which I had hitherto lived in ignorance, I condescended to listen to his terms. He proceeded to inform me of my great felicity in not falling into the hands of an extortioner, and assured me, that I should find him extremely moderate in his demands, he was not, indeed, certain, that he could furnish me with the whole sum, for people were at this particular time extremely pressing and importunate for money, yet as I had the appearance of a gentleman, he would try what he could do, and give me his answer in three days.

At the expiration of the time, I called upon him again, and was again informed of the great demand for money, and that, "money was money now" he then advised me to be punctual in my payment, as that might induce him to befriend me hereafter; and delivered me the money, deducting at the rate of five and thirty per cent with another panegyrick upon his own moderation

I will not tire you with the various practices of usurious oppression, but cannot omit my transac tion with Squeeze on Tover hill, who finding me a young man of considerable expectations, employed an agent to persuade me to borrow five hundred pounds, to be refunded by an annual payment of twenty per cent during the joint lives of his daughter Nancy Squeeze and myself The negociator came prepared to inforce his proposal with all his art, but finding that I caught his offer with the eagerness of necessity, he grew cold and linguid, he had men "tioned it out of kindness, he would try to serve me "Mr Squeeze was anhonest man, but extremely can "tious" In three days he came to tell me that his endervours had been meffectual Mr Squeeze having no good opinion of my life but that there was one expedient remaining, Mrs Squeeze could influence her husband, and her good will might be gained by a complement. I waited that afternoon on Mr. Squeere, and poured out before her the flatteries which it wally gun access to runk and beauty. I did not then know, that there are places in which the only compliment is a bribe Having yet credit with a jeweller I afterwards procured a ring of thirty gumens which I humbly presented, and was soon admitted to a treaty with Mr Squeeze He appeared prevish and backward, and my old friend whispered me that he would never make a dry bargain I there fore, invited him to a tayern. Nine time we met on the affair, nine times I paid four pounds for the supper and claret, and nine sume is I gave the agent for good offices I then obtained the money, paying ten per cent advance, and at the tenth meeting gave another supper, and disbursed fifteen pounds for the writings

Others who styled themselves brokers, would only trust their money upon goods: that I might, therefore, try every art of expensive folly, I took a house and furnished it—I amused myself with despoiling my moveables of their glossy appearance, for fear of alarming the lender with suspicions, and in this I succeeded so well, that he favoured me with one hundred and sixty pounds upon that which was rated at seven hundred. I then found that I was to maintain a guardian about me to prevent the goods from being broken or removed. This was, indeed, an unexpected tax, but it was too late to recede, and I comforted myself, that I might prevent a creditor, of whom I had some apprehensions, from seizing, by having a prior execution always in the house.

By such means I had so embariassed myself, that my whole attention was engaged in contilving excuses, and raising small sums to quiet such as words would no longer mollify. It cost me eighty pounds in presents to Mr Leech the attorney, for his forbearance of one hundred, which he solicited me to take when I had no need. I was perpetually harassed with importunate demands, and insulted by wretches, who a few months before would not have dared to raise their eyes from the dust before me. I lived in continual terrour, frighted by every noise at the door, and terrified at the approach of every step quicker than common. I never retired to rest, without feeling the justness of the Spanish proverb,

"Let him who sleeps too much borrow the pillow of a debtor,' my solicitude and vexation kept me long waking, and when I had closed my eyes, I was pursued or insulted by visionally balliffs.

When I reflected upon the meanness of the slufts I had reduced myself to I could not but curse the folly and extravagance that had overwhelmed me in a sea of troubles from which it was highly amprobable that I should ever emerge. I had some time lived in hopes of an estate, at the death of my uncle, but he disappointed me by mairying his housekeeper, and catching an opportunity soon after of quarrelling with me for settling twenty pounds a year upon a girl whom I had seduced, told me that he would take care to prevent his fortune from being squandered upon prostitutes.

Nothing now remained, but the chance of extracating myself by marriage a scheme which I flattered myself, nothing but my present distress would have made me think on with patience. I determined therefore to look out for a tender novice, with a large fortune at her own disposal and accordingly fixed my eyes upon Miss Biddy Simper. I had now paid her six or seven visits, and so fully convinced her of my being a gentleman and write that I made no doubt that both her person and fortune would be soon mine.

At this critical time. Miss Gripe called upon me in a chaiot bought with my money and loaded with trinkets that I had in my days of affluence laushed on her. Those days were now over and there was little hope that they would ever return. She was not able to withstand the temptation of ten pounds.

that Talon the bailiff offered her, but brought him into my apartment disguised in a livery; and taking my sword to the window, under pretence of admiring the workmanship, beckoned him to seize me

Delay would have been expensive without use, as the debt was too considerable for payment or bail: I, therefore, suffered myself to be immediately conducted to jail.

Confinement of any kind is dreadful, a prison is sometimes able to shock those, who endure it in a good cause let your imagination, therefore, acquaint you, with what I have not words to express, and conceive, if possible, the horiours of imprisonment attended with reproach and ignominy, of involuntary association with the refuse of mankind, with wretches who were before too abandoned for society, but being now freed from shame or fear are hourly improving their vices by consorting with each other

There are, however, a few, whom like myself imprisonment has rather mortified than hardened with these only I converse, and of these you may perhaps hereafter receive some account from

Your humble servant,

Misargyrus.

It is well known, that many things appear plausible in speculation, which can never be reduced to practice, and that of the numberless projects that have flattered mankind with theoretical speciousness, few have served any other purpose than to show the in genuity of their contriver. A voyage to the moon, however romantick and absurd the scheme may now appear, since the properties of air have been better understood seemed highly probable to many of the aspiring wits in the last century, who began to don't upon their glossy plumes, and fluttered with impatience for the hour of their departure

Vol. III L petually

petually gaining upon the human mind, and which, though every trial ends in disappointment, obtain new credit as the sense of miscarriage wears gradually away, persuade us to try again what we have tried already, and expose us by the same failure to double vexation

Of this tempting, this delusive kind, is the expectation of great performances by confederated strength. The speculatist, when he has carefully observed how much may be performed by a single band, calculates by a very easy operation the force of thousands, and goes on accumulating power till resistance vanishes before it, then rejoices in the success of his new scheme, and wonders at the folly or idleness of former ages, who have fixed in want of what might so readily be procured, and suffered themselves to be debarred from happiness by obstacles which one united effort would have so easily surmounted

But this gigantick phantom of collective power vanishes at once into air and emptiness, at the first attempt to put it into action. The different apprehensions, the discordant passions, the jairing interests of men, will scarcely permit that many should unite in one undertaking.

Of agreat and complicated design, some will never be brought to discern the end, and of the several means by which it may be accomplished, the choice will be a perpetual subject of debate, as every man is swayed in his determination by his own knowledge or convenience. In a long series of action some will languish with fatigue, and some be drawn off by present gratifications, some will lotter because others labour, and some will cease to labour because others

lotter and if once they come within prospect of success and profit some will be greedy and others envious, some will undertake more than they can perform, to enlarge their claims of advantage, some will perform less than they undertake, lest their labours should chiefly turn to the benefit of others

The history of mankind informs us that a single power is very soldom broken by a confederacy States of different interests and aspects malevolent to each other, may be united for a time by common distress and in the ardour of self preservation full unanimously upon an enemy, by whom they are all equally endangered. But if their first attack can be withstood time will never ful to dissolve their union success and miscairings will be equally destructive after the conquest of a province, they will quarrel in the division after the loss of a battle all will be en deavouring to secure themselves by abandoning the rest.

From the impossibility of confining numbers to the constant and uniform prosecution of a common interest arises the difficulty of securing subjects against the encroachment of governours. Power is always gradually stealing away from the many to the few, because the few are more vigilant and consistent it still contracts to a smaller number, till in time it centers in a single person.

Thus all the forms of governments instituted among mankind, perpetually tend toward monarchy, and power, however diffused through the whole community, is by negligence or corruption, commotion or distress, reposed at last in the chief magnitude.

"There never appear," says Swift, "more than "five or fix men of genius in an age, but if they "were united, the world could not stand before "them" It is happy, therefore, for mankind, that of this union there is no probability. As men take in a wider compass of intellectual survey, they are more likely to chuse different objects of pursuit; as they see more ways to the same end, they will be less easily persuaded to travel together, as each is better qualified to form an independent scheme of private greatness, he will reject with greater obstinacy the project of another, as each is more able to distinguish thimself as the head of a party, he will less readily be made a follower or an associate.

The reigning philosophy informs us, that the vast bodies which constitute the universe, are regulated in their progress through the ethercal spaces, by the perpetual agency of contrary forces, by one of which they are restrained from deserting their orbits, and losing themselves in the immensity of heaven, and held off by the other from rushing together, and clustering round their center with everlasting cohesion

The same contrariety of impulse may be perhaps discovered in the motions of men we are formed for society, not for combination, we are equally unqualified to live in a close connexion with our fellowbeings, and in total separation from them, we are attracted towards each other by general sympathy, but kept back from contact by private interests

Some philosophers have been foolish enough to imagine, that improvements might be made in the system of the universe, by a different arrangement of the orbs of heaven; and politicians, equally ignorant and equally presumptuous may easily be led to sup pose, that the happiness of our world would be promoted by a different tendency of the human mind. It appears, indeed to a slight and superficial observer, that many things impracticable in our present state, might be easily effected, if mankind were better disposed to union and co operation, but a little reflection will discover, that if confederacies were easily formed, they would lose their efficiety, since numbers would be opposed to numbers, and unanimity to unanimity, and instead of the present petty competitions of individuals or single families multitudes would be supplanting multitudes, and thousands plotting against thousands

There is no class of the human species, of which the union seems to have been more expected than of the learned the rest of the world have almost always agreed to shut scholars up together in colleges and cloisters surely not without hope that they would look for that happiness in concord, which they were debarred from finding in variety and that such conjunctions of intellect would recompense the mumificence of founders and patrons, by performances above the reach of any single mind

But discord, who found means to roll her apple into the banqueting chamber of the goddesses, has had the address to scatter her laurels in the seminaries of learning. The friendship of students and of beauties is for the most part equally sincere, and equally durable as both depend for happines on the regard of others on that of which the value arises merely from comparison, they are both exposed to perpetual jealousies, and both incessantly employed in schemes to intercept the praises of each other.

I am, however, far from intending to inculcate that this confinement of the studious to studious companions, has been wholly without advantage to the publick: neighbourhood, where it does not conciliate friendship, incites competition, and he that would contentedly rest in a lower degree of excellence, where he had no rival to dread, will be urged by his impatience of inferiority to incessant endeavours after great attainments

These stimulations of honest rivalry are, perhaps, the chief effects of academies and societies, for whatever be the bulk of then joint labours, every single piece is always the production of an individual, that owes nothing to his colleagues but the contagion of diligence, a resolution to write, because the rest are writing, and the scorn of obscurity while the rest are illustrious.

Quicunque turpi fraude semel inrotuit

Etiamsi vera duri amiltit fidem Pnin

The wretch that often has deceived, Though truth he speaks is no er believed

WHEN Austotle was once asked, what a man could gun by uttering filseloods? he replied, "Not to "be credited when he shall tell the truth

The character of a lar is at once so hateful and contemptible, that even of those who have lost their virtue it might be expected that from the violation of truth they should be restruned by their pride Almost every other vice that disgraces human nature, may be kept in counten ince by applicate and issociation the corrupter of viigin innocence sees himself envied by the men, and at least not detested by the women the drunkard may easily unite with beings, devoted like himself to noisy merriments or silent insensibility, who will celebrate his victories over the novices of intemperance boast themselves the companions of his prowess and tell with rapture of the multitudes whom unsuccessful emulation has hurned to the grave even the robber and the cut throat have their followers who admire their address and intrepidity their stratagems of tapine, and their fidelity to the gang

The har, and only the har, is invariably and universally despised, abandoned, and disowned, he has no domestick consolations, which he can oppose to the censure of mankind, he can retrie to no fraternity, where his crimes may stand in the place of victues, but is given up to the hisses of the multitude, without friend and without apologist. It is the peculiar condition of falsehood, to be equally detested by the good and bad. "The devils," says Sii Thomas Brown, "do not tell his to one another, for truth is "necessary to all societies, nor can the society of "hell subsist without it"

It is natural to expect, that a crime thus generally detested should be generally avoided, at least, that none should expose himself to unabated and unpitted infamy, without an adequate temptation, and that to guilt so easily detected, and so severely punished, an adequate temptation would not readily be found

Yet so it is, that in defiance of censure and contempt, truth is frequently violated, and scarcely the most vigilant and unremitted circum-pection will secure him that mixes with mankind, from being hourly deceived by men of whom it can scarcely be imagined, that they mean any injury to him or profit to themselves, even where the subject of conversation could not have been expected to put the passions in motion, or to have excited either hope or fear, or zeal or malignity, sufficient to induce any man to put his reputation in hazard, however little he might value it, or to overpower the love of truth, however weak might be its influence

various degrees of malignity but they have, I think generally omitted that which is most common and perhaps not least mischicvous, which, since the moralists have not given it virunc, I shall distinguish as the he of anity

To vanity may justly be imputed most of the fal choods which every man perceives hourly playing upon his ear, and, perhaps most of those that are propagated with success. To the he of commerce, and the he of malice, the motive is so upparent, that they are seldom negligently or implicitly received suspicion is always witchful over the practices of interest and whatever the hope of pan, or desire of mischief can prompt one man to assert, another is by reasons equally cocent incided to refute. But yantly pleases her elf yath such slight gratifications, and looks forward to pleasure so remotely consequential, that her practices ruse no alarm, and her stratagems are not easily discovered.

Vanity 1, indeed, often suffered to pass impursued by suspicion, because he that a ould watch her motions, can never be at rest friud and malice are bounded in their influence, some opportunity of time and place is neces any to their actions, but caree any man is abstracted one moment from his vanity and he, to whom truth affords no gratifications, is generally inclined to seek them in falsehoods

It is remarked by Sir Kenelm $D_{i,j}$ by, "that every man has a desire to appear superior to others "though it were only in having seen what they have not seen. Such an accidental advantage, since it neither implies ment, nor confers dignity, one would think should not be desired so much as to be counterfeited.

counterfeited yet even this vanity, trifling as it is, produces innumerable narratives, all equally false, but more or less credible in proportion to the skill or confidence of the relater. How many may a man of diffusive conversation count among his acquaintances, whose lives have been signalized by number-less escapes, who never cross the river but in a storm, or take a journey into the country without more adventures than befel the knights-errant of ancient times in pathless forests or enchanted castles! How many must be know, to whom portents and prodigies are of daily occurrence; and for whom nature is hourly working wonders invisible to every other eye, only to supply them with subjects of conversation!

Others there are that amuse themselves with the dissemination of falsehood, at greater hazard of detection and disgrace, men marked out by some lucky planet for universal confidence and friendship, who have been consulted in every difficulty, intrusted with every secret, and summoned to every transaction. it is the supreme felicity of these men, to stun all companies with noisy information, to still doubt, and overbear opposition, with certain knowledge . or authentick intelligence A har of this kind, with a strong memory or brisk imagination, is often the oracle of an obscure club, and, till time discovers his impostures, dictates to his hearers with uncontrouled authority, for if a publick question be started, he was present at the debate; if a new fashion be mentioned, he was at court the first day of its appearance, if a new performance of literature draws the attention of the publick, he has pationized the author, author and seen his work in manuscript if reliminal of eminence be condemned to die he often piedicted his fite and endeavoured his reformation and who that lives at a distance from the scene of action. will dare to contradict a man who reports from his own eyes and ears and to whom all persons and affairs are thus intimately known?

This kind of filsehood is generally successful for a time, because it is practised at first with timidity and caution but the prosperity of the lau is of short duration, the reception of one story is always an incitement to the forgery of mother less probable and he goes on to triumph over their credulity, till pride or reason rises up against him, and his companions will no longer endure to see him wiser than themselves

It is apparent that the inventors of all these fictions intend some explication of themselves and are led off by the pursuit of honour from their attendance upon truth their narratives always imply some consequence in fivour of their courage, their sagacity or their activity, their familiarity with the learned, or their reception among the gient, they are always bribed by the present pleasure of seeing them elves superiour to those that surround them und receiving the homage of silent attention and envious admiration

But vanity is sometimes excited to fiction by less visible gratifications the pic entage abounds with a race of liars who are content with the consciousness of falsehood and whose pride is to deceive others without any gain or glory to themselves Of this tribe it is the supreme pleasure to remark a lady in the playhouse or the park, and to publish, under the character of a man suddenly enamoured, an advertisement in the news of the next day, containing a minute description of her person and her dress. From this artifice, however, no other effect can be expected, than perturbations which the writer can never see, and conjectures of which he never can be informed: some mischief, however, he hopes he has done, and to have done mischief, is of some importance sets his invention to work again, and produces a narrative of a robbery or a murder, with all the circumstances of time and place accurately adjusted. This is a jest of greater effect and longer duration. if he fixes his scene at a proper distance, he may for several days keep a wife in terioui for her husband, or a mother for her son, and please himself with reflecting, that by his abilities and address some addition is made to the miseries of life

There is, I think, an ancient law of Scotland, by which leasing-making was capitally punished. I am, indeed, far from desiring to increase in this kingdom the number of executions, yet I cannot but think, that they who destroy the confidence of society, weaken the credit of intelligence, and interrupt the security of life; harass the delicate with shame, and perplex the timorous with alarms; might very properly be awakened to a sense of their crimes, by denunciations of a whipping-post or pillory, since many are so insensible of right and wrong, that they have no standard of action but the law; nor feel guilt, but as they dread punishment.

Quisque suos patimur Manes Ving Each has his lot and bears the fate he drew

SIR, Fleet May 6

In consequence of my engagements, I address you once more from the habitations of misery. In this place, from which business and pleasure are equally excluded and in which our only employment and discussion is to hear the narratives of each other. I might much sooner have gathered materials for a letter, had I not hoped to have been reminded of my promise, but since I find my self placed in the regions of oblivion, where I am no less neglected by you than by the rest of markind, I resolved no longer to wait for solicitation, but stole early this evening from between gloomy sullenness and notous merriment, to give you an account of part of my companions

One of the most eminent members of our club is Mr Edward Scamper a man of whose name the Olympick heroes would not have been ashamed Ved was born to a small estate which he determined to improve and therefore as soon as he became of age, mortgaged part of his land to buy a mare and stallion, and bred horses for the course. He was at first very successful, and guned several of the kings plates, as he is now every day boasting, at the expense of very little more than ten times their value. At last, however, he discovered, that victory brought him more honour than profit. resolving, therefore, to be rich as well as illustrious, he replenished his pockets by another mortgage, became on a sudden a daring better, and resolving not to trust a jockey with his fortune, rode his horse himself, distanced two of his competitors the first heat, and at last won the race, by forcing his horse on a descent to full speed at the hazard of his neck. His estate was thus repaired, and some friends that had no souls advised him to give over, but Ned now knew the way to riches, and therefore without caution increased his expenses From this hour he talked and dreamed of nothing but a horserace, and using soon to the summit of equestrian reputation, he was constantly expected on every course, divided all his time between loids and jockeys, and, as the unexperienced regulated then bets by his example, gained a great deal of money by laying openly on one hoise and secretly on the Ned was now so sure of growing nich, that he involved his estate in a third mortgage, borrowed money of all his friends, and risked his whole fortune upon Bay Lincoln He mounted with beating heart, started fair, and won the first heat, but in the second, as he was pushing against the foremost of his invals, his girth broke, his shoulder was dislocated, and before he was dismissed by the surgeon, two bailiffs fastened upon him, and he saw Newmarket no more His daily amusement for four years has been to blow the signal for starting, to make imaginary matches, to repeat the pedigiec of Bay Lincoln, and to form resolutions against trusting another groom with the choice of his guth

The next in seniority is Mr. Timothy Sing a man of deep contrivence and impenetrable secrece. This father died with the reputation of more wealth than he possessed. Tim, therefore, entered the world with a reputed fortune of ten thousand pounds. Of this he very well knew that eight thousand was imaginary but being a man of refined policy, and knowing how much honour is annexed to riches, he resolved never to detect his own poverty, but furnished his hou e with elegance, scattered his money with profusion encouraged every scheme of costly pleasure, spoke of petty losses with negligence, and on the day before in execution entered his doors, had proclaimed at a publick table his resolution to be jolted no longer in a backney coach.

Another of my companions is the magna imous Jack Scatter, the son of 1 country gentleman, who having no other care than to leave him rich considered that literature could not be hid without expense masters would not teach for nothing, and when a book was bought and read, it would well for little Jack was, therefore, trught to read and write by the butler and when this acquisition was made was left to pass his days in the kitchen and the stable. where he heard no crime censured but covetousness and distrust of poor honest servants, and where all the praise was bestowed on good housekeeping and a fiee heart At the death of his father, Jack set himself to retrieve the honour of his family he abandoned his cellar to the butler ordered his groom to provide hay and corn at di cretion, took his house keeper sword for the expenses of the kitchen allowed all his servants to do their work by deputies, permitted his domesticks to keep his house open to their relations and acquaintance, and in ten years was conveyed hither, without having purchased by the loss of his patrimony either honour or pleasure, or obtained any other gratification than that of having corrupted the neighbouring villagers by luxury and idleness

Dick Serge was a draper in Cornhill, and passed eight years in prosperous diligence, without any care but to keep his books, or any ambition but to be in time an alderman. but then, by some unaccountable revolution in his understanding, he became enamoured of wit and humour, despised the conversation of pedlars and stockjobbers, and rambled every night to the regions of gayety, in quest of company suited to his taste The wits at first flocked about him for sport, and afterwards for interest; some found their way into his books, and some into his pockets, the man of adventure was equipped from his shop for the puisuit of a fortune, and he had sometimes the honour to have his security accepted when his friends were in distress with these associations, he soon learned to neglect his shop, and having drawn his money out of the funds, to avoid the necessity of teasing men of honour for trifling debts, he has been forced at last to retire lither, till his friends can procure him a post at court

Another that joins in the same mess is Bob Coince, whose life has been spent in fitting up a house. About ten years ago Bob purchased the country habitation of a bankrupt—the mere shell of a building, Bob holds no great matter, the inside is the test of elegance. Of this house he was no sooner master than he summoned twenty workmen to his assistance, tore up the floors and laid them anew, stripped off the wainscot, drew the windows.

windows from their frames, altered the disposition of doors and fire places, and cast the whole fabrick into a new form his next care was to have his ceilings painted his printels guilt, and his chimney pieces carved every thing was executed by the ablest hands Bob's business was to follow the workmen with a microscope and call upon them to retouch their performances and heighten excellence to perfection The reput tion of his house now brings round him a daily confluence of visitants and every one tells him of some elegance which he has hitherto overlooked, some convenience not yet procured or some new mode in ornament or furniture Bob, who had no wish but to be admired nor any guide but the fashion, thought every thing beautiful in proportion as it was new, and considered his work as unfi nished, while any observer could suggest an addition some alteration was therefore every day made without any other motive than the charms of novelty A. traveller at last suggested to him the convenience of a grotto Bob immediately ordered the mount of his garden to be excreated, and having laid out a large sum in shells and minerals, was busy in regulating the disposition of the colours and lustres, when two gentlemen, who had asked permission to see his gardens presented him a writ, and led him off to less elegant apartments

I know not Sir, whether among this fraternity of sorrow you will think any much to be pitied, nor indeed do many of them appear to solicit compassion for they generally applaud their own conduct, and despise those whom want of taste or spirit suffers to growrich It were happy if the prisons of the kingdom Vor. were filled only with characters like these, men whom prosperity could not make useful, and whom rum cannot make wise: but there are among us many who raise different sensations, many that owe their present misery to the seductions of treachery, the strokes of casualty, or the tenderness of pity, many whose sufferings disgrace society, and whose virtues would adorn it: of these, when familiarity shall have enabled me to recount their stories without horror you may expect another narrative from,

Numb 58 Saturday, May 25, 17,3

Damnant quod non intelligunt Cic They condemn what they do not understand

EURIPIDES having presented Socrates with the writings of Heraclitus, a philosopher famed for involution and obscurity, inquired afterwards his opinion of their ment. "What I understand, said Socrates, "I find to be excellent and, therefore, believe that to be of equal value which I cannot understand."

The reflection of every man who reads this passage will suggest to him the difference between the practice of Socrates and that of modern criticks Socrates who had, by long observation upon himself and others, discovered the weakness of the strongest, and the dimness of the most enlightened intellect was afruid to decide hastily in his own favour, or to con clude that an author had written without meaning, because he could not immediately catch his ideas he knew that the faults of books are often more justly imputable to the reader, who sometimes wants atten tion, and sometimes penetration, whose understand ing is often obstructed by prejudice, and often dissi pated by remissness who comes sometimes to a new study unfurnished with knowledge previously neces sary and finds difficulties insuperable, for want of ardour sufficient to encounter them

Obscurity and clearness are relative terms: to some readers scarce any book is easy, to others not many are difficult and surely they, whom neither any exuberant praise bestowed by others, nor any eminent conquests over stubborn problems, have entitled to exalt themselves above the common orders of mankind, might condescend to imitate the candour of Socrates, and where they find incontestible proofs of superiour genius, be content to think that there is justness in the connexion which they cannot trace, and cogency in the reasoning which they cannot comprehend

This diffidence is never more reasonable than in the perusal of the authors of antiquity, of those whose works have been the delight of ages, and transmitted as the great inheritance of mankind from one generation to another; surely, no man can, without the utmost arrogance, imagine that he brings any superiority of understanding to the perusal of these books which have been preserved in the devastatation of cities, and snatched up from the wicck of nations, which those who fled before barbarians have been careful to carry off in the hurry of migration, and of which barbarians have repented the destruction. If in books thus made venerable by the uniform attestation of successive ages, any passages shall appear unworthy of that praise which they have formerly received, let us not immediately determine, that they owed then reputation to dulness or bigotry, but suspect at least that our ancestors had some reasons for their opinions, and that our ignorance of those reasons makes us differ from them.

It often happens that an author's reputation is endangered in succeeding times, by that which raised the loudest applause among his cotempor iries nothing is read with greater pleasure than allusions to recent facts, reigning opinions, or present contro versies but when facts are forgotten and contro versies extinguished, these favourite touches lose all their graces, and the author in his descent to pos terity must be left to the mercy of chance, without any power of ascertaining the memory of those things, to which he owed his luckiest thoughts and his Lindest reception

On such occasions, every reader should remember the diffidence of Socrates, and repair by his cando ir the injuries of time, he should impute the seeming defects of his author to some chasm of intelligence, and suppose that the sense which is now weak was once forcible, and the expression which is now dubious formerly determinate

How much the mutilation of ancient history has taken away from the beauty of poetical performances. may be conjectured from the light which a lucky commentator sometimes effuses, by the recovery of an incident that had been long forgotten thus in the third book of Horace Juno s denunciations against those that should presume to raise again the walls of Troy, could for many ages please only by splendid images and swelling language of which no man dis covered the use or propriety, till Le Tevre by show ing on what occasion the Ode was written changed wonder to rational delight Many passages vet undoubtedly remain in the same author which an exacter knowledge of the incidents of his time would clear

clear from objections. Among these I have always numbered the following lines:

Autum per medios ire satellites,

Ictu fulmineo. Concidit Auguris

Argivi domus ob lucium

Demersa excidio Diffidit urbium

Portas vii Macedo, et subruit æmulos

Reges muneribus Munera navium

Sævos illaqueant duces.

Stronger than thunder's winged force,
All-powerful gold can spread its course,
Thio' watchful guards its passage make,
And loves thio' solid walls to break.
From gold the overwhelming woes,
That crush'd the Grecian augur rose;
Philip with gold thro' cities broke,
And rival monarchs felt his yoke;
Captains of ships to gold are slaves,
Tho' fierce as their own winds and waves.

FRANCIS.

The close of this pasage, by which every reader is now disappointed and offended, was probably the delight of the Roman court · it cannot be imagined, that Horace, after having given to gold the force of thunder, and told of its power to storm cities and to conquer kings, would have concluded his account of its efficacy with its influence over naval commanders, had he not alluded to some fact then current in the mouths of men, and therefore more interesting for a time than the conquests of Philip. Of the like kind may be reckoned another stanza in the same book

Jussa coram non sine conscio Surgit marito seu locat institor Seu navis Hispinæ migister Dedecorum pretiosus emptor

The conscious husband bids her rise,

When some rich factor courts her charms,
Who calls the wanton to his arms
And produgal of wealth and fame,
Profusely buys the costly shame

TPANCIS.

He has little knowledge of Horace who imagines that the factor, or the Spanish merchant, are mentioned by chance—there was undoubtedly some popular story of an intrigue—which those names recalled to the memory of his reader

The firme of his genius in other parts, though somewhat dimmed by time, is not totally eclipsed, his address and judgment yet appear though much of the spirit and vigour of his sentiment is lost this has happened to the twentieth Ode of the first book,

Vile potabis modicis Sabinum
Canthuris Graca quod ego ipse testa
Conditum levi, datus in theatro
Câm tibi plausus,
Chare Macenas eques Ut paterni
Pluminis ripæ simul et jocosa
Redderet laudes tibi Valicani
Montis imago

A poet's beverage humbly cheap, (Should great Mæcenas be my guest) The vintage of the Sabine grape, But yet in sober cups shall crown the feast: 'Twas rack'd into a Grecian eask, Its rougher juice to melt away; I seal'd it too—a pleasing task ! With annual joy to mark the glorious day, When in applausive shouts thy name Spread from the theatre around, Floating on thy own Tiber's stream, And Echo, playful nymph, return'd the sound.

Francis.

We here easily remark the intertexture of a happy compliment with an humble invitation, but certainly are less delighted than those, to whom the mention of the applause bestowed upon Mæcenas, gave occasion to recount the actions or words that produced it.

Two lines which have exercised the ingenuity of modern criticks, may, I think, be reconciled to the judgment, by an easy supposition: Horace thus addresses Agrippa, > Scriberis Vario fortis, et hostium Victor, Mæonii caiminis alite.

Values, a swan of Homer's wing, Shall brave Agrippa's conquests sing.

That Varius should be called "A bird of Homeric "song," appears so harsh to modern ears, that an emendation of the text has been proposed. but surely the learning of the ancients had been long ago obliterated, Ţ

terated, had every man thought himself at liberty to corrupt the lines which he did not understand. If we imagine that Varius had been by any of his cotemporaries celebrated under the appellation of Misarum Ales, the swan of the Muses the language of Horace becomes graceful and familiar, and that such a compliment was at least possible we know from the transformation feigned by Horace of himself

The most elegant compliment that was paid to Addison, is of this obscure and perishable kind

When punting Virtue her last efforts made, You brought your CLIO to the virgin s aid

These lines must please as long as they are understood, but can be understood only by those that have observed Addison's signatures in the Spectator

The nicety of these minute allusions I shall exemplify by another instance which I take this occasion to mention, because, as I am told, the commentators have omitted it Tibullus addresses Cynthia in this manner

Te spectem suprema mihi cum venerit hora, Te teneam moriens deficiente manu

Before my closing eyes dear Cynthia stand, Held weakly by my fainting trembling hand

To these lines Ovid thus refers in his elegy on the death of Tibullus

Cynthia decedens, felicius, inquit, amata
Sum tibi, vixisti dum tuus ignis ci am,
Cui Nemesis, quid, ait, tibi sunt mea damna dolori?
Me tenuit moriens deficiente manu.

Blest was my reign, retning Cynthia cry'd Noi till he left my breast, Tibullus dy'd Foibear, said Nemesis, my loss to moan, The fainting trembling hand was mine alone.

The beauty of this passage, which consists in the appropriation made by Nemesis of the line originally directed to Cynthia, had been wholly imperceptible to succeeding ages, had chance, which has destroyed so many greater volumes, deprived us likewise of the poems of Tibullus.

Fleet, June 6

To the account of such of my companions as are imprisoned without being miscrable or are miscrable without any claim to compassion, I promised to add the histories of those, whose virtue has made them unhappy, or a hose misfortunes are at least without a crime. That this catalogue should be very numerous, neither you nor your leaders ought to expect, "rair quippe boil," the good are few. Virtue is uncommon in all the classes of humanity, and I suppose it will scarcely be imagined more frequent in a prison than in other places.

Yet in these gloomy regions is to be found the tenderness, the generosity the phil inthropy of Serenus who might have lived in competence and ease, if he could have looked without emotion on the miseries of another Serenus was one of those exalted exalted minds, whom knowledge and sagacity could not make suspicious; who poured out his soul in boundless intimacy, and thought community of possessions the law of friendship. The friend of Screnus was arrested for debt, and after many endeavours to soften his creditor, sent his wife to solicit that assistance which never was refused. The tears and importunity of female distress were more than was necessary to move the heart of Serenus; he hasted immediately away, and conferring a long time with his friend, found him confident that if the present pressure was taken off, he should soon be able to re-Serenus, accustomed to believe, establish his affairs and afiaid to aggravate distress, did not attempt to detect the fallacies of hope, nor reflect that every man overwhelmed with calamity believes, that if that was removed he shall immediately be happy: he, therefore, with little hesitation offered limself as smety

In the first raptures of escape all was joy, gratitude, and confidence, the friend of Serenus displayed his prospects, and counted over the sums of which he should infallibly be master before the day of payment Serenus in a short time began to find his danger, but could not prevail with himself to repent of beneficence, and therefore suffered himself still to be amused with projects which he durst not consider, for fear of finding them impracticable debtor, after he had tried every method of raising money which ait or indigence could prompt, wanted either fidelity or resolution to suitender himself to puson, and left Serenus to take his place.

Screnus has often proposed to the creditor to pay him whatever he shall appear to have lost by the flight of his friend, but however reasonable this proposal may be thought, avance and brutahty have been hitherto mevorable and Screnus still continues to languish in prison

In this place, however, where want makes almost every man selfish, or desperation gloomy, it is the good fortune of Serenus not to live without a friend he passes most of his hours in the conversation of Candidus, a man whom the same virtuous ductility has with some difference of circumstances made equally unhappy Candidus, when he was young, helpless, and ignorant, found a patron that educated protected and supported him his patron being more vigilant for others, than himself, left at his death an only son, destitute and friendless Candidus was eager to repay the benefits he had received. and having maintained the youth for a few years at his own house, afterwards placed him with a meichant of eminence, and gave bonds to a great value as a security for his conduct

The young man, removed too early from the only eye of which he dreaded the observation and deprived of the only instruction which he heard with reverence soon learned to consider virtue as restruint, and restraint as oppression and to look with a longing eye at every expense to which he could not reach and every pleasure which he could not patched by degrees he deviated from his first regularity and unhappily mingling among young men busy in dissipating the gains of their fathers industry he forgot the precepts of Candidus, spent the evening in parties of pleasure, and the morning in expedients to support his riots. He was, however, dexterous and active in business, and his master, being secured against any consequences of dishonesty, was very little solicitous to inspect his manners, or to enquire how he passed those hours, which were not immediately devoted to the business of his profession—when he was informed of the young man's extravagance or debauchery, "let his bondsman look to that," said he, "I have taken care of myself."

Thus the unhappy spendthrift proceeded from folly to folly, and from vice to vice, with the connivance if not the encouragement of his master; till in the heat of a nocturnal revel he committed such violences in the street as drew upon him a criminal prosecution. Guilty and unexperienced, he knew not what course to take; to confess his crime to Candidus, and solicit his interposition, was little less dicadful than to stand before the frown of a court of justice. Having, therefore, passed the day with anguish in his heart and distraction in his looks, he seized at night a very large sum of money in the compting house, and setting out he knew not whither, was heard of no more

The consequence of his flight was the ruin of Candidus, ruin surely undeserved and irreproachable, and such as the laws of a just government ought either to prevent or repair nothing is more inequitable than that one man should suffer for the crimes of another, for crimes which he neither prompted nor permitted, which he could neither foresee nor prevent. When we consider the weakness of human resolutions and the inconsistency of human human conduct, it must appears absurd that one man shall engage for another, that he will not change his opinions or alter his conduct

It is I think, worthy of consideration whether, since no wager is binding without a possibility of loss on each side at is not equally reasonable that no contract should be valid without reciprocal stipulations but in this case, and others of the same kind, what is stipulated on his side to whom the bond is given? he takes advantage of the security neglects his affairs omits his duty, suffers timorous wickedness to grow daiing by degrees permits appetite to call for new gratifications, and, perhaps secretly longs for the time in which he shill have power to seize the forfeiture and if virtue or gra titude should prove too strong for temptation and a young man persist in honesty however instigated by his passions what can secure him at last against afalse accusation? I for my part always shall suspect that he who can by such methods secure his property, will go one step farther to increase it nor can I think that man safely trusted with the means of mischief, who, by his desire to have them in his hands gives an evident proof how much less he values his neighbour s happiness than his own

Another of our companions is Lentulus a man whose dignity of birth was very ill supported by his fortune. As some of the first offices in the kingdom were filled by his relations he was early invited to court and encouraged by caresses and promises to attendance and solicitation a const interpretation in splendid company necessarily required magnificence magnificence of diess, and a frequent participation of fashionable amusements forced him into expense: but these measures were requisite to his success; since every body knows, that to be lost to sight is to be lost to remembrance, and that he who desires to fill a vacancy, must be always at hand, lest some man of greater vigilance should step in before him.

By this course of life his little fortune was every day made less · but he received so many distinctions in publick, and was known to resort so familiarly to the houses of the great, that every man looked on his preferment as ceitain, and believed that its value would compensate for its slowness he, therefore, found no difficulty in obtaining credit for all that his rank or his vanity made necessary . and, as ready payment was not expected, the bills were proportionably enlarged, and the value of the hazard or delay were adjusted solely by the equity of the creditor. At length death deprived Lentulus of one of his patrons, and a revolution in the ministry of another, so that all his prospects vanished at once, and those that had before encouraged his expenses, began to perceive that their money was in danger there was now no other contention but who should first seize upon his person, and, by forcing immediate payment, deliver him up naked to the vengeance of the In pursuance of this scheme, one of them invited him to a tavein, and procured him to be arrested at the door, but Lentulus instead of endeavouring secretly to pacify him by payment, gave notice to the rest, and offered to divide amongst them

them the remnant of his fortune—they feasted six hours at his expense—to deliberate on his proposal, and at last determined—that—as he could not offer more than five shillings in the pound, it would be more prudent to keep hum in prison—till he could procure from his relations the payment of his debts

I entulus is not the only man confined within these walls, on the same account the like procedule, upon the like motives is common among men whom yet the law allows to partake the n e of fire and water with the compassionate and the just, who frequent the assemblies of commerce in open day, and talk with detestation and contempt of highwaymen or housebreakers but, surely, that man must be con fessedly robbed who is compelled, by whitever means to pay the debts which he does not owe, nor can I look with equal hatred upon him, who at the hazard of his life, holds out his pistol and demands my purse, as on him who plunders under shelter of the law, and by detaining my son or my friend in prison, extorts from me the price of their liberty No man can be more an enemy to society than lie. by whose machinations our virtues are turned to our disadvantage he is less destructive to mankind that plunders cowardice than he that prevs upon compassion

I believe, Mr Adventurer, vou will readily confess, that though not one of the elif tried before a commercial judicature can be wholly acquitted from impludence or temerity, yet that in the eye of all who can consider virtue as distinct from whalth, the fault of two of them, at least is outweighed by the Vol. III.

by the circumstances of his life, as not to deserve a perpetual prison—yet must these, with multitudes equally blameless, languish in confinement, till malevolence shall relent, or the law be changed

I am, SIR,

Your humble Servant,

MISARGYRUS.

Numb. 67 Tuesday, June 26, 1753.

VIRG.

They polish life by useful arts.

That familiarity produces neglect, has been long observed. The effect of all external objects, however great or splendid, ceases with their novelty, the courtier stands without emotion in the royal presence, the rustick tramples under his foot the beauties of the spring with little attention to their colours or their fragrance, and the inhabitant of the coast darts his eye upon the immense diffusion of waters, without awe, wonder, or terrour.

Those who have past much of their lives in this great city, look upon its opulence and its multitudes, its extent and variety, with cold indifference, but

As Socrates was passing through the fair at Athens, and casting his eyes over the shops and customers, how many things are here,' says he, 'that I do not 'want!' The same sentiment is every moment using in the mind of him that walks the streets of London, however inferiour in philosophy to Socrates—he beholds a thousand shops crowded with goods, of which he can scarcely tell the use, and which, therefore, he is apt to consider as of no value—and, indeed many of the arts by which families are supported, and wealth is heaped together, are of that minute and superfluous kind, which nothing but experience could evince possible to be prosecuted with advantage, and which, as the world might easily want, it could scarcely be expected to encourage

But so it is, that custom, curiosity, or wantonness, supplies every art with patrons, and finds purchasers for every manufacture, the world is so adjusted, that not only bread, but riches may be obtained without great abilities, or arduous performances the most unskilful hand and unenlightened mind have sufficient incitements to industry, for he that is resolutely busy, can scarcely be in want There is, indeed, no employment, however despicable, from which a man may not promise himself more than competence, when he sees thousands and myriads raised to dignity, by no other ment than that of contributing to supply their neighbours with the means of sucking smoke through a tube of clay, and others raising contributions upon those, whose elegance disdains the grossness of smoky luxury, by gunding the same materials into a powder that may at once gratify and impair the smell

Not only by the e popular and mode hat after but by a thou and unbecked and evane cent kinds of bu mess are the mulatude of the city pre-cryed from idleness and con equently from want. In the endless viriety of tastes and circums ances that diversify mankind nothing is a reaffuous but that ome one de ire it, or so common but that one one is compelled to buy it. As nothing is usele s but beone of is in improver hands, what is thrown away by one i gathered up by another, and the refu e of part of mankind formules a subordingte class with the materials necessiry to their upport

When I look round upon those who are thus yo rion by exerting their on diffication. I cannot but ed mure the occur concutenation of society that links together the great and the near the illustron and the and consider with benevolent satisfaction. that no man unless he body or mind be totally de abled has need to juffer the mortification of seeing lumself us less or burthen one to the community he that will diligently labour in whatever occupation will deserve the artenance which be obtain and the protection which he enjoy and may be down every malit with the ple ving consciousnes, of baying contributed omething to the happine's of life

Contempt and admiration are equally incident to narrow mands the whose comprehent on can take in the whole subordination of mail and and whose i.e. spicienty compiered to the real tate of things through the thin veils of fortime or of fishion will discover, me inness in the highest stations and dignity in the memest, and find that no min can become ve

netable but by virtue, or contemptable but by wickedness

In the midst of this universal hurry, no man ought to be so little influenced by example, or so void of honest emulation, as to stand a lazy spectator of incessant labour, or please himself with the mean happiness of a drone, while the active swarms are buzzing about him: no man is without some quality, by the due application of which he might deserve well of the world; and whoever he be that has but little in his power, should be in haste to do that little, lest he be confounded with him that can do nothing

By this general concurrence of endeavours, aits of every kind have been so long cultivated, that all the wants of man may be immediately supplied, idleness can scarcely form a wish which she may not gratify by the toil of others, or curiosity dream of a toy, which the shops are not ready to afford her

Happiness is enjoyed only in proportion as it is known, and such is the state or folly of man, that it is known only by experience of its contrary we who have long lived amidst the conveniences of a town immensely populous, have scarce an idea of a place where desire cannot be gratified by money. In order to have a just sense of this artificial plenty, it is necessary to have passed some time in a distant colony, or those parts of our island which are thinly inhabited, he that has once known how many trades every man in such situations is compelled to exercise, with how much labour the products of nature must be accommodated to human use, how long the loss or defect of any common utensil must be endured, or by what awkward expedients it must be supplied, how fir men may wander with money in their hands before any can sell them what they wish to buy, will know how to rate at its proper value the plenty and case of a great city

But that the happiness of man may still remain imperfect is wants in this place are easily supplied, new wants likewise are easily created every man, in surveying the shops of Lon lon sees numberless instruments and conveniences of which, while he did not know them, he never felt the need, and yet, when use has made them familiar, wonders how life could be supported without them. Thus it comes to pass that our desire always increase with our possessions, the knowledge that something remains yet unenjoyed impairs our enjoyment of the good before us

They who have been accustomed to the refine ments of science and multiplications of contrivance, soon lose their confidence in the unassisted powers of nature, forget the paucity of our real necessities, and overlook the casy methods by which they may be supplied. It were a speculation worthy of a plu losophical mind, to a minical low much is taken away from our native abilities, as well as added to them by artificial expedients. We are so accustomed to give and receive assistance that each of us singly can do little for hunself, and there is so are any one among us however contracted may be his form of life who does not empty the labour of a thou

But a survey of the various nations that inhabit the earth will inform us, that life may be supported with less assistance, and that the dexterity, which practice enforced by necessity produces, is able to effect much by very scanty means. The nations of Merico and Peru erected cities and temples without the use of non, and at this day the rude Indian supplies himself with all the necessaries of life like the rest of mankind naked into the world, as soon as his parents have nursed him up to strength, he is to provide by his own labour for his own sup-His first care is to find a sharp flint among the rocks, with this he undertakes to fell the trees of the forest, he shapes his bow, heads his arrows, builds his cottage, and hollows his canoe, and from that time lives in a state of plenty and prosperity, he is sheltered from the storms, he is fortified against beasts of prey, he is enalled to pursue the fish of the sea, and the deer of the mountains, and as he does not know, does not envy the happiness of polished nations, where gold can supply the want of fortitude and skill, and he whose laborious ancestors have made him rich, may lie stretched upon a couch, and see all the treasures of all the elements poured down before him

This picture of a savage life, if it shows how much individuals may perform, shows likewise how much society is to be desired. Though the perseverance and address of the Indian excite our admiration, they nevertheless cannot procure him the conveniencies which are enjoyed by the vagrant beggar of a civilized country. he hunts like a wild beast to satisfy his hunger: and when he lies down to rest after a successful chase, cannot pronounce himself secure against the danger of perishing in a few days, he is, perhaps, perhaps content with his condition, because he knows not that a better is attainable by man, as he that is born blind does not long for the perception of light because he cannot conceive the advantages which light would afford him, but hunger, wounds and weariness ue real earls though he believes them equally incident to all his fellow creatures—and when a tempest compels him to he starving in his hut, he cannot justly be concluded equally happy with those whom art has exempted from the power of chance, and who make the foregoing year provide equally incident to the his below electures and when a tempest compels him to he starving in his hut, he cannot justly be concluded equally happy with those whom art has exempted from the power of chance, and who make the foregoing year provide for the following.

To receive and to communicate assistance constitutes the happiness of human life man may indeed, preserve his existence in solutide but can enjoy it only in society the greatest understanding of an individual doomed to procure food and clothing for himself will basely supply him with expedients to keep off death from day to day, but as one of a large community performing only his share of the common business, he gains leisure for intellectual pleasures and enjoys the happiness of reason and reflection.

Terè libenter homines id quod volunt credunt. CASAR.

Men willingly believe what they wish to be true.

TULLY has long ago observed, that no man, however weakened by long life, is so conscious of his own decrepitude, as not to imagine that he may yet hold his station in the world for another year

Of the truth of this remark every day furnishes new confirmation—there is no time of life, in which men for the most part seem less to expect the stroke of death, than when every other eye sees it impending, or are more busy in providing for another year, than when it is plain to all but themselves, that at another year they cannot arrive. Though every funeral that passes before their eyes evinces the deceitfulness of such expectations, since every man who is born to the grave thought himself equally certain of living at least to the next year, the survivor still continues to flatter himself, and is never at a loss for some reason why his life should be protracted, and the voracity of death continued to be pacified with some other prey

But this is only one of the innumerable aitifices plactised in the universal conspiracy of mankind against themselves every age and every condition indulges some darling fallacy, every man amuses himself with projects which he knows to be improbable, and which, therefore, he resolves to pursue without daring to examine them Whatever any m in ardently desires, he very readily believes that he shall some time attain he whose intemperancely isoverwhelmed him with diseases while he languishes in the spring. expects vicour and recovery from the summer sun and while he melts away in the summer transfers his hopes to the frosts of winter he that gazes upon elegance or pleasure which want of money lunders him from imitating or partaking comforts himself that the time of distress will oon be at an end, and that every day brings him nearer to a state of happi ness though he knows it has passed not only with out acquisition of advantage but perhaps without endeavours after it in the formation of schemes that cannot be executed, and in the contemplation of prospects which cannot be approached

Such is the general dream in which we all slumber out our time—every man thinks the day coming in which he shall be gratified with all his wishes in which he shall leave all those competitors behind who are now rejoicing like himself in the expectation of victory, the day is always coming to the servile in which they shall be powerful to the obscure in which they shall be eminent—ind to the deformed in which they shall be beautiful

If any of my readers has looked with so little attention on the world about him as to imagine this representation exaggerated beyond probability let him reflect a little upon his own life let him consider what were his hopes and pro pects ten years upon and what additions he then expected to be made by ten years to his happiness those years are now elapsed, have they made good the promise that was extorted from them, have they advanced his fortune, enlarged his knowledge, or reformed his conduct, to the degree that was once expected? I am afraid, every man that recollects his hopes, must confess his disappointment, and own that day has glided unprofitably after day, and that he is still at the same distance from the point of happiness

With what consolations can those, who have thus miscarried in their chief design, clude the memory of their ill success? with what amusements can they pacify their discontent, after the loss of so large a portion of life? they can give themselves up again to the same delusions, they can form new schemes of airy gratifications, and fix another period of felicity, they can again resolve to trust the promise which they know will be broken, they can walk in a circle with their eyes shut, and persuade themselves to think that they go forward

Of every great and complicated event, part depends upon causes out of our power, and part must be effected by vigour and perseverance. With regard to that which is styled in common language the work of chance, men will always find reasons for confidence or distrust, according to their different tempers or inclinations, and he that has been long accustomed to please himself with possibilities of fortuitous happiness, will not easily or willingly be reclaimed from his mistake. But the effects of human industry and skill are more easily subjected to calculation whatever can be completed in a year, is divisible into parts, of which each may be performed in the compass of a day, he, therefore, that has passed the day without attention to the task assigned him may be certain that the lapse of life has brought him no nearer to his object, for whatever idleness may expect from time its produce will be only in proportion to the diligence with which it has been used. He that floats lazily down the stream, in pursuit of something born along by the same current will find himself indeed move forward, but unless he lays his hand to the oar uid increases his speed by his own labour, must be always at the same distance from that which he is following

There have happened in every age ome contingencies of unexpected and undeserve I success by which those who are determined to believe whatever fivours their inclinations, have been encouraged to delight themselves with future advintages—they sup politically the proper use is to chase away despan—it is equally absurd to sit down in idleness because some have been enriched without labour, as to leap a precipice because some have fillen and escaped with life, or to put to ea in a storm because some lave been driven from a wreck upon the coast to which they are bound

We are all ready to confe.s, the belief ought to be proportioned to evidence or probability let any man therefore, compare the number of those who have been thus favoured by fortune and of those who have failed of their expectations and he will easily determine, with what justness he has registered himself in the lucky catalogue

But there is no need on these occasions for deep inquiries or laborio is calculations, there is a far easier method of distinguishing the hopes of folly from those of icason, of finding the difference between prospects that exist before the eyes, and those that are only painted on a fond imagination Drowsy had accustomed himself to compute the profit of a darling project till he had no longer any doubt of its success, it was at last matured by close consideration, all the measures were accurately adjusted, and he wanted only five hundred pounds to become master of a fortune that might be envied by a director of a trading company generous and grateful, and was resolved to recompense this small assistance with an ample fortune: he, therefore, deliberated for a time, to whom amongst his friends he should declare his necessities, not that he suspected a refusal, but because he could not suddenly determine which of them would make the best use of riches, and was, therefore, most worthy of his favour At last his choice was settled, and knowing that in order to borrow he must show the probability of repayment, he prepared for a minute and copious explanation of his project. But here the golden dream was at an end he soon discovered the impossibility of imposing upon others the notions by which he had so long imposed upon himself, which way soever he tuined his thoughts, impossibility and absurdity arose in opposition on every side, even credulity and piejudice were at last forced to give way, and he giew ashamed of crediting himself what shame would not suffer him to communicate to another

mind Whatever is true will bear to be related, whatever is rational will endure to be explained, but when we delight to brood in secret over future happiness, and silently to employ our meditations upon schemes of which we are conscious that the bare mention would expose us to derision and con tempt we should then remember, that we are cheating ourselves by voluntary delusions, and bring up to the unreal mockenes of fancy, those hours in which solid advantages might be attained by sober thought and rational assidiuty

There is, indeed, so little certainty in human affairs that the most cautious and severe examiner may be allowed to indulge some hopes which he cannot prove to be much favoured by probability, since after his utmost endeavours to ascertain events he must often leave the issue in the hands of chance. And so scanty is our present allowance of happiness, that in many situations life could scarcely be supjoited if hope were not allowed to relieve the present hour by pleasures borrowed from futurity and reminante the languor of dejection to new efforts, by pointing to distant regions of felicity, which yet no resolution of perseverance shall ever reach

But these like all other cordrals though they may invigorate in a small quantity, intoxicate in a greater these pleasures like the rest are lawful only in certain circumstances and to certain degrees, they may be useful in a due subserviency to noblei purposes but become dangerous and destructive when once they gain the ascendant in the heart to soothe the mind to tranquility by hope even when that hope is likely to deceive us, may be sometimes useful, but to lull our faculties in a lethargy, is poor and despicable

Vices and errours are differently modified, according to the state of the minds to which they are incident; to indulge hope beyond the warrant of reason, is the failure alike of mean and elevated understandings; but its foundation and its effects are totally different the man of high courage and great abilities is apt to place too much confidence in himself, and to expect from a vigorous excition of his powers more than spirit or diligence can attain: between him and his wish he sees obstacles indeed, but he expects to overleap or break them, his mistaken ardom hurries him forward, and though perhaps he misses his end, he nevertheless obtains some collateral good, and performs something useful to mankind and honomable to himself

The drone of timidity presumes likewise to hope, but without ground and without consequence; the bliss with which he solaces his hours, he always expects from others, though very often he knows not from whom he folds his aims about him, and sits in expectation of some revolution in the state that shall raise him to greatness, or some golden shower that shall load him with wealth, he dozes away the day in musing upon the morrow, and at the end of life is roused from his dream only to discover that the time of action is past, and that he can now show his wisdom only by repentance.

I mist my and lost my way By crack braind wisdom led astray

SIR.

It has long been charged by one part of mankind upon the other, that they will not take advice, that counsel and instruction are generally thrown away, and that, in defiance both of admonition and example all claim the right to choose their own measures and to regulate their own lives

That there is something in advice very useful and salutary, seems to be equally confessed on all hands. since even those that reject it, allow for the most part that rejection to be wrong but charge the fault upon the unskilful manner in which it is given, they admit the efficacy of the medicine, but abhor the nauseousness of the vehicle

Thus mankind have gone on from century to some have been advising others how to act and some have been teaching the advisers how to advise, yet very little alteration has been made in the world. As we must all by the law of nature enter life in ignorance we must all make our way through it by the light of our own

Vor. III N experience, experience; and, for any security that advice has been yet able to afford, must, endeavour after success at the hazard of miscarriage, and learn to do right by venturing to do wrong

By advice I would not be understood to mean, the everlasting and invariable principles of moral and religious truth, from which no change of external circumstances can justify any deviation, but such directions as respect merely the prudential part of conduct, and which may be followed or neglected without any violation of essential duties

It is, indeed, not so frequently to make us good as to make us wise, that our friends employ the officiousness of counsel, and among the rejectors of advice, who are mentioned by the grave and sententious with so much acrimony, you will not so often find the vicious and abandoned, as the pert and the petulant, the vivacious and the giddy

As the great end of female education is to get a husband, this likewise is the general subject of female advice—and the dreadful denunciation against those volatile girls, who will not listen patiently to the lectures of wrinkled wisdom, is, that they will die unmarried, or throw themselves away upon some worthless fellow, who will never be able to keep them a coach

I being naturally of a ductile and easy temper, without strong desires or quick resentments, was always a favourite amongst the elderly ladies, because I never rebelled against seniority, nor could be charged with thinking myself wise before my time, but heard every opinion with submissive silence, professed myself ready to learn from all who seemed inclined inclined to teach me, paid the same grateful acknow ledgments for precepts contradictory to each other, and if any controversy arose was careful to side with her who presided in the company

Of this compliance I very early found the advan tage for my aunt Matilda left me a very large addition to my fortune, for this reason chiefly as she herself declared, because I was not above hearing good counsel, but would sit from morning till night to be instructed, while my sister Sukey, who was a year younger than myself and was, therefore, in greater want of information, was so much conceited of her own knowledge that whenever the good lady in the ardour of benevolence reproved or instructed her she would pout or litter, interrupt her with questions or embarrass her with objections

I had no design to supplant my sister by this complaisant attention, nor, when the consequence of my obsequiousness came to be known, did Sukey so much envy as despise me I was however, very well pleased with my success, and having received, from the concurrent opinion of all mankind, a notion, that to be rich was to be great and happy, I thought I had obtained my advantages at an easy rate and resolved to continue the same passive attention, since I found myself so powerfully recommended by it to kindness and esteem

The desire of advising has a very exten ive prevafence, and since advice cannot be given but to those that will here it, a patient listener is necessary to the accommodation of all those who desire to be confirmed in the opinion of their own wisdom a patient listener, however, is not always to be had, the present age, whatever age is present, is so vitiated and disordered, that young people are readier to talk than to attend, and good counsel is only thrown away upon those who are full of their own perfections

I was, therefore, in this scarcity of good sense, a general favourite, and soldom saw a day in which some sober mation did not invite me to her house, or take me out in her chariot, for the sake of instructing me how to keep my character in this censorious age, how to conduct myself in the time of courtship, how to stipulate for a settlement, how to manage a husband of every character, regulate my family, and educate my children

We are all naturally credulous in our own favour. Having been so often caressed and applicated for my docility, I was willing to believe my self really chlightened by instruction, and completely qualified for the task of life. I did not doubt but I was entering the world with a mind furnished against all exigencies, with expedients to extricate myself from every difficulty, and sagacity to provide against every danger, I was, therefore, in haste to give some specimen of my prudence, and to show that this liberality of instruction had not been idly layished upon a mind incapable of improvement

My purpose, for why should I deny it? was like that of other women, to obtain a husband of tank and fortune superious to my own, and in this I had the concurrence of all those that had assumed the province of directing me. That the woman was undone who married below herself, was universally agreed and though some ventured to assert, that the richer man ought invariably to be preferred, and that that money was a sufficient compenation for a defective incestry wet the majority declared warmly for a gentleman, and were of opinion that upstate should not be encouraged

With regard to other qualifications I had an irreconcilcable variety of instructions. I was sometimes told that deformity was no defect in a man and that he who was not encouraged to intrigue by an opinion of his person, was more likely to value the tender ness of his wife, but a grave widow directed me to choose a man who might imagine himself agree ible to me for that the deformed were always insupport ably signant, and apt to sink into sullenness or burst into rage if they found their wife's eye windering for a moment to a good face or a landsome shape

They were, however all unanimous in warning me, with repeated crutions against all thoughts of union with a wit as a being with whom no happiness could possibly be emoyed men of every other kind I was taught to govern but a wit a san animal for whom no arts of tamine, had been yet discovered the woman whom he could once get within his power was considered as lost to all hope of dominion or of quiet for he would detect artiface and defeat allurement and if once he discovered any failure of conduct, would believe his own eye, in definince of tears, caresses, and protest thous

In pursuance of the estage principles. I proceeded to form my schemes, and while I was a to the first bloom of youth, was taken out at an a semble by Mi. First.—I am afraid my cheeks glowed and my eyes sparkled, for I observed the loofs of all my superintendants fixed anxiously upon me, and I was next day cautioned against him from all hands, as a man of the most dangerous and formidable kind, who had writ verses to one lady, and then forsaken her only because she could not read them, and had lampooned another for no other fault than defaming his sister

Having been hitherto accustomed to obey, I ventured to dismiss Mr Frish, who happily did not think me worth the labour of a lampoon I was then addressed by Mr Sturdy, and congratulated by all my friends on the manois of which I was shortly to be lady but Sturdy's conversation was so gross, that after the third visit I could endure him no longer; and incurred, by dismissing him, the censure of all my friends, who declared that my nicety was greater than my prudence, and that they feared it would be my fate at last to be wretched with a wit

By a wit, however, I was never afterwards attacked, but lovers of every other class, or pretended lovers, I have often had, and, notwithstanding the advice constantly given me, to have no regard in my choice to my own inclinations, I could not forbear to discard some for vice, and some for rudeness. I was once loudly censured for refusing an old gentleman who offered an enormous jointure, and died of the phthisic a year after, and was so baited with incessant importunities, that I should have given my hand to Drone the stock-jobber, had not the reduction of interest made him afraid of the expenses of matrimony

Some, indeed, I was permitted to encourage, but miscarried of the main end, by treating them according to the rules of ait which had been prescribed me Altaler, an old maid, infused into me so much haughtine and recree, that some of my lovers with drew the medices from my frown and returned no more others were driven as it, by the demands of settlement which the widow Trapland directed me to make and I have learned by many experiments, that to all advice is to be emportunity.

I may r sometimes heard it disputed in conversation, whether it be more I and able or de grable, that a man should think too highly or too me anly of him elf at is on all hands agreed to be be to that he should think rightly but since a fullable being, will always made once deviations from exact rectifiede, it is not wholly a cless to inquire towards which side it is after to decline.

The prejudices of mankind seem to favour him a ho errs by underrating his own powers. In 18 con idered as a mode tand harmles member of society, not likely to break the peace by competition, to an de wour after such splendour of reputation is many a fair.

dim the lustre of others, or to interrupt any in the enjoyment of themselves, he is no man's rival, and, therefore, may be every man's friend

The opinion which a man entertains of himself ought to be distinguished, in order to an accurate discussion of this question as it relates to persons or to things. To think highly of ourselves in companison with others, to assume by our own authority that precedence which none is willing to grant, must be always invidious and offensive, but to rate our powers high in proportion to things, and imagine ourselves equal to great undertakings, while we leave others in possession of the same abilities, cannot with equal justice provoke censure.

It must be confessed, that self-love may dispose us to decide too hastily in our own favour: but who is huit by the mistake? If we are incited by this vain opinion to attempt more than we can perform, ours is the labour, and ours is the disgrace

But he that dares to think well of himself, will not always prove to be mistaken, and the good effects of his confidence will then appear in great attempts and great performances if he should not fully complete his design, he will at least advance it so far as to leave an easier task for him that succeeds him; and even though he should wholly fail, he will fail with honour

But from the opposite errour, from torpid despondency can come no advantage, it is the frost of the soul, which binds up all its powers, and congeals life in perpetual sterility. He that has no hopes of success, will make no attempts, and where nothing is attempted, nothing can be done,

Every

Every man should therefore, endeavour to maintain in himself a favourable opinion of the powers of the human mind—which are perhaps, in every man, greater than they appear, and might, by diligent call tration, be evalted to a degree beyond what their possessor presumes to believe. There is scarce any man but has found himself able, at the instigation of necessity, to do what in a state of leisure and deliberation he would have concluded impossible, and some of our species have significant themselves by such achievements, as prove that there are few things above human hope

It has been the policy of all nations to preserve, by some publick monuments, the memory of those who have served their country by great exploits there is the same reason for continuing or reviving the names of those, whose extensive abilities have dignified humanity. Anthonest emul tron may be allike excited, and the philosopher's curiosity may be inflamed by a catalogue of the works of Boyle or Bacon, is Themistocles was kept marke by the trophies of Mulrades

Among the favourites of nature that have from time to time appeared in the world enriched with various endowments and contrarieties of excellence, none seems to have been more exalted above the common rate of humanity, than the man known about two centuries ago by the appellation of the Admirable Crichton, of whose history whateverwe may suppress as surpassing credibility, yet we shall, upon incontestable authority relate enough to rank him among produgies

'Virtue, says Pirgil, 'is better accepted when it comes in a pleasing form—the person of Crichton was eminently beautiful, but his beauty was con-

he would spring at one bound the length of twenty feet upon his antagonist, and he used the sword in either hand with such force and dexterity, that scarce any one had courage to engage him

Having studied at St Andrew's in Scotland, he went to Paris in his twen's -first year, and affixed on the gate of the college of Navarre a kind of challenge to the learned of that university to dispute with him on a certain day: offering to his opponents, whoever they should be, the choice of ten languages, and of all the faculties and sciences. On the day appointed three thousand auditors assembled, when four doctors of the church and fifty masters appeared against him, and one of his antagonists confesses, that the doctors were defeated, that he gave proofs of knowledge above the reach of man; and that a hundred years passed without food or sleep, would not be sufficient for the attainment of his learning a disputation of nine hours he was presented by the president and professors with a diamond and a purse of gold, and dismissed with repeated acclamations

From Paris he went away to Rome, where he made the same challenge, and had in the presence of the Pope and cardinals the same success. Afterwards he contracted at Venice an acquaintance with Aldus Manutius, by whom he was introduced to the learned of that city—then visited Padua, where he engaged in another publick disputation, beginning his performance with an extemporal poem in praise of the city and the assembly then present, and concluding with an oration equally unpremeditated in commendation of ignorance

He afterwards published another challenge, in which he declared himself ready to detect the errours of Aristotle and all his commentators, either in the common forms of logick, or in any which his an tagonists should propose of a hundred different kinds of verse

These requisitions of learning however stupendous. were not gained at the expense of any pleasure which youth generally indulges or by the omission of any accomplishment in which it becomes a gentleman to excel he practised in great perfection the arts of drawing and painting he was an emment performer in both vocal and instrumental musick danced with uncommon gricefulnes and on the day after his disputation at Paris exhibited his skill in horsemanship before the court of France where at a publick match of tilting, he bore away the ring upon his lance fifteen times together

He excelled likewise in domestick games of less dignity and reputation, and in the interval between his challenge and disputation at Pari he spent so much of his time at cards, dice and tennis that a lampoon was fixed upon the gate of the Sorbonne, directing those that would see this monster of erudi tion, to look for him at the tavern

So extensive was his acquaintance with life and manners that in an Italian comedy composed by himself and calibited before the court of Mancua, he is said to have personated fifteen different cha racters in all which he might succeed without great difficulty, since he had such pover of reten tion, that once hearing an oration of an hour he would repeat it exactly, and in the recital follow

Nor was his skill in arms less than in learning, or his comage inferiour to his skill—there was a paizefighter at Mantua, who travelling about the world, according to the barbarous custom of that age, as a general challenger, had defeated the most celebrated masters in many prots of Europe, and in Mantua, where he then resided, had killed three that appeared against him. The duke repented that he had granted him his protection; when Crichton looking on his sangumary success with indignation, offered to stake fifteen hundred pistoles, and mount the stage against The duke, with some reluctance, consented, and on the day fixed the combatants appeared their weapon seems to have been single rapier, which was then newly introduced in Italy. The prize-fighter advanced with great violence and fierceness, and Crichton contented himself calmly to ward his passes, and suffered him to exhaust his vigour by his own Crichton then became the assailant, and pressed upon him with such force and agility, that he thrust him thrice through the body, and saw him expire. he then divided the prize he had won among the widows whose husbands had been killed

The death of this wonderful man I should be willing to conceal, did I not know that every reader will inquire curiously after that fatal hour, which is common to all human beings, however distinguished from each other by nature or by fortune

and turbulent disposition. On this occasion it was. that he composed the comedy in which he exhibited so many different characters with exact propriety But his honour was of short continuence, for as he was one might in the time of Carmia al rambling about the streets, with his Luitar in his hand, he was attacked by six men masked Nother his courage nor skill in this cargence deserted him the opposed them with such activity and spirit, that he soon dispersed them, and distraicd their leader who throwing off his misk, discovered himself to be the prince his pupil Crichton fulling on his I nees tool his own sword by the point, and presented it to the prince, who immediately seized it and instiguted as son c say, by jerlousy, recording to others only by drunken fury and brutal resentment, thrust hum through the heart

Hus was the admirable Crichton brought into that state, in which he could excel the memest of mankind only by a few empty honours paid to his memory the court of Mantaa testified their esteem by a publick mourning the contemporary wats were profuse of their encountries, and the values of Italy were adorted with pictures, representing hum on horseback with a lince in one hand and a book in the other.

TRANCIS.

SIR,

It has been observed, I think, by Sir William Temple, and after him by almost every other writer, that England affords a greater variety of characters than the rest of the world. This is ascribed to the liberty prevailing amongst us, which gives every man the privilege of being wise or foolish his own way, and preserves him from the necessity of hypocrisy or the servility of imitation.

That the position itself is true, I am not completely satisfied. To be nearly acquainted with the people of different countries can happen to very few, and in life, as in every thing else beheld at a distance, there appears an even uniformity the petty discriminations which diversify the natural character, are not discoverable but by a close inspection, we, therefore, find them most at home, because there we have most opportunities of remarking them. Much less am I convinced, that this peculiar diversification, if it be real, is the consequence of peculiar liberty;

liberty for where is the government to be found that superintends individuals with so much vigilance as not to leave their private conduct without retraint? Can it enter into a reason ble mind to invenie, that men of every other nation are not equally masters of their own time or houses with ourselve, and equally at liberty to be parsimonious or profile frolick or sullen, distinct o luxurious? I identy is certainly necessary to the full play of predominant humours, but such liberty it to be found alike under the government of the many of the few, in monarchies or in commonwealths.

How readily the predominant passion suitches an interval of liberty, and how for the expands at elf when the weight of restruint is taken in av, I had lately in opportunity to discover, as I took a journity into the country in a stage couch, which as every journey is a land of identure may be very properly related to you, though I can display no such extraordinary a sembly as Cerrantes has collected at Don Quivoles in

In a stage coach the passengers are for the mote part wholly unknown to one another and without expectation of ever meeting again when their journey is at an end, one should the cfore marrine, that it was of little importance to any of them what conjectures the ret should form concerning him let so it is that as ill think them class secure from detection, all assume that character of which they are most desirous, and on no occasion is the general ambition of superiority more upparently indulged

On the day of our departure, in the twilight of the morning, I ascended the vehicle with three men and two women, my fellow travellers. It was easy to observe the affected elevation of mien with which every one entered, and the supercitious civility with which they paid their compliments to each other. When the first ceremony was dispatched, we sat silent for a long time, all employed in collecting importance into our faces, and endeavouring to strike reverence and submission into our companions.

It is always observable that silence propagates itself, and that the longer talk has been suspended, the more difficult it is to find any thing to say. began now to wish for conversation, but no one seemed inclined to descend from his dignity, or first propose a topick of discourse At last a corpulent gentleman, who had equipped himself for this expedition, with a scarlet suitout and a large hat with a broad lace, drew out his watch, looked on it in silence, and then held it dangling at his finger I suppose, understood by all the company as an invitation to ask the time of the day, but nobody appeared to heed his overture: and his desire to be talking so far overcame his resentment, that he let us know of his own accord that it was past five, and that in two hours we should be at breakfast

His condescension was thrown away, we continued all obdurate, the ladies held up their heads, I amused myself with watching their behaviour; and of the other two, one seemed to employ himself in counting the trees as we drove by them, the other drew his hat over his eyes and counterfeited a slumber. The man of benevolence, to show that he was not depressed by our neglect, hummed a tune and beat time upon his snuff box.

Thus universally displeased with one another and not much delighted with ourselves we came at last to the little inn appointed for our repast, and all began at once to recompense themselves for the con straint of silence, by innumerable questions and orders to the people that attended us At last what every one had called for was got or declared in possible to be got at that time, and we were persuaded to sit round the same table when the gentleman in the red surtout looked again upon his watch told us that we had half an hour to spare, but he was sorry to see so little merriment among us that all fellow trivellers were for the time upon the level, and that it was always his way to make himself one of the company 'I remember, says he "it was on just " such a morning as this, that I and my Lord Mumble and the Duke of Tenterden were out upon a ramble we called at a little house as it might be this and my landlady I warrant you, not suspect "ing to whom she was talking was so jocular and "facetious, and made so many merry answers to our questions that we were all ready to burst with Inighter At last the good woman happening to overhear me whisper the duke and call him by his "title, was so surprised and confounded that we " could scarcely get a word from her, and the duke ' never met me from that day to this, but he tall s of the little house and quarrels with me for " terrifying the landlady '

He had scarcely time to congratulate himself on the veneration which this narrative must have procured him from the company when one of the ladies having reached out for a plate on a distant part of Vot. III

the table, began to remark, "the inconveniencies of "travelling, and the difficulty which they who never sat at home without a great number of attendants, found in performing for themselves such offices as the road required, but that people of quality often travelled in disguise, and might be generally known from the vulgar by their condescension to poor innkeepers, and the allowance which they made for any defect in their entertainment, that for her part, while people were civil and meant well, it was never her custom to find fault, for one was not to expect upon a journey all that one enjoyed at one's own house"

A general emulation seemed now to be excited. One of the men, who had hitherto said nothing, called for the last newspaper, and having perused it a while with deep pensiveness, "It is impossible," says he, "for any man to guess how to act with regard to "the stocks, last week it was the general opinion "that they would fall, and I sold out twenty thou-"sand pounds in order to a purchase they have "now risen unexpectedly, and I make no doubt but at my return to London I shall risk thirty "thousand pounds among them again"

A young man, who had lutherto distinguished himself only by the vivacity of his looks, and a frequent diversion of his eyes from one object to another, upon this closed his snuff-box, and told us that "he "had a hundred times talked with the chancellor" and the judges on the subject of the stocks; that "for his parthe did not pretend to be well acquainted "with the principles on which they were established, "but had always heard them reckoned pernicious to

'trade, uncertain in their produce, and unsolid in "their foundation" and that he had been advised by three judges his most intimate friends, never to venture his money in the funds but to put it out upon land security, till he could light upon an 'estate in his own country'

It might be expected, that upon these glimpses of latent dignity, we should all have begin to look round us with veneration and have believed like the princes of romance when the inchainment that disguises them is dissolved, and they discover the dignity of each other yet it happened, that none of these hints made much impression on the company every one was apparently suspected of endeavouring to impose false appearances upon the rest all continued their haughtness in hopes to enforce their claims and all grew every hour more sullen, because they found their representations of themselves with out effect

Thus we travelled on four days with malevolence perpetually increasing, and without any endeavour but to outrie each other in superciliousness and neglect and when any two of us could separate ourselves for a moment, we vented our indignation at the squeiness of the rest

At length the journey was at an end and time and chance, that strip off all disguises, have discovered that the intimate of lords and dukes is a nobleman soutler, who has furnished a shop with the money he has saved, the man who deals so largely in the funds is a clerk of a broker in Change alley, the lady who so carefully concealed her quality keeps a cook shop behind the Erchange, and the young man, who is so happy in the friendship of the judges, englosses and transcribes for bread in a garret of the Temple Of one of the women only I could make no disadvantageous detection, because she had assumed no character, but accommodated herself to the scene before her, without any struggle for distinction or superiority

I could not forbear to reflect on the folly of practising a fraud, which, as the event showed, had been already practised too often to succeed, and by the success of which no advantage could have been obtained; of assuming a character, which was to end with the day, and of claiming upon false pretences honours which must perish with the breath that paid them

But, Mi Adventurer, let not those who laugh at me and my companions, think this folly confined to a stage coach. Every man in the journey of life takes the same advantage of the ignorance of his fellow travellers, disguises himself in counterfeited merit, and hears those praises with complacency which his conscience reproaches him for accepting. Every man deceives himself, while he thinks he is deceiving others, and forgets that the time is at hand when every illusion shall cease, when fictitious excellence shall be torn away, and all must be shown to all in their real estate

I am, SIR,

Your humble Servant,

Qui cupit optatam cursu contingere metam

Blulta tulit fecitque puer Hor

The youth who hopes th Olympick prize to gain
All arts must try and every toil sustain. Francis

It is observed by Bacon that "reading makes v full "man, conversation a ready man, and writing an "exact man

As Baconnitained to degrees of knowledge scarcely ever reached by any other man, the directions which he gives for study have certainly a just claim to our regard, for who can teach an art with so great authority as he that has practised it with undisputed success?

Under the protection of so great a name, I shall, therefore, venture to inculcate to my ingenious con temporaries the necessity of reading the fitness of consulting other understandings than their own, and of considering the sentiments and opinions of those who however neglected in the present age, had in their own times and many of them a long time afterwards, such reputation for knowledge and acute ness as will scarcely ever be attained by those that despise them

An opinion has of late been, I know not how, pro pagated among us that libraries are filled only with useless lumber, that men of parts stand in need of no assistance, and that to spend life in poring upon books, is only to imbibe prejudices, to obstruct and embarrass the powers of nature, to cultivate memory at the expense of judgment, and to bury reason under a chaos of indigested learning.

Such is the talk of many who think themselves wise, and of some who are thought wise by others; of whom part probably believe their own tenets, and part may be justly suspected of endeavouring to shelter their ignorance in multitudes, and of wishing to destroy that reputation which they have no hopes to share. It will, I believe, be found invariably true, that learning was never decreed by any learned man, and what credit can be given to those, who wenture to condemn that which they do not know?

If reason has the power ascubed to it by its advocates, if so much is to be discovered by attention and meditation, it is hard to believe, that so many millions, equally participating of the bounties of nature with ourselves, have been for ages upon ages meditating in vain. if the wits of the present time expect the regard of posterity, which will then inherit the reason which is now thought superiour to instruction, surely they may allow themselves to be instructed by the reason of former generations When, therefore, an author declares, that he has been able to learn nothing from the writings of his predecessors, and such a declaration has been lately made, nothing but a degree of allogance unpardonable in the greatest human understanding, can hinder him from perceiving that he is raising prejudices against his own performance, for with what hopes of success can he attempt that in which greater abilities abilities have hitherto miscarried? or with what pe cultur force does he suppose himself invigorated, that difficulties hitherto invincible should give way before him.

Of those whom Providence has qualified to make any additions to human knowledge the number is extremely small, and what can be added by each single mind, one of this superiour class, is very little the greatest part of mankind must owe all their knowledge, and all must owe fur the larger part of it to the information of others. To understand the works of celebrated authors, to comprehend their systems and retain their reasonings, is a task more than equal to common intellects, and he is by no means to be accounted useless or idle, who has stored his mind with acquired knowledge, and can detail it occasionally to others who have less leisure or weaker abilities.

Persus has justly observed, that knowledge is no thing to him who is not known by others to possess it to the scholar himself it is nothing with respect either to honour or advantage for the world cannot reward those qualities which are concerled from it, with respect to others it is nothing, because it affords no help to ignorance or errour

It is with justice therefore that in an accomplished character Horace unites just sentiments with the power of expressing them, and he that has once accumulated learning is next to consider how he shall most widely diffuse and most ignerably impart it as Pope expresses it, "with learned dust," and wears out his days and nights in perpetual research and solitary meditation, is too apt to lose in his elocution what he adds to his wisdom, and when he comes into the world, to appear overloaded with his own notions, like a man armed with weapons which he cannot wield. He has no facility of inculcating his speculations, of adapting himself to the various degrees of intellect which the accidents of conversation will present, but will talk to most unintelligibly, and to all unpleasantly

I was once present at the lectures of a profound philosopher, a man really skilled in the science which he professed, who having occasion to explain the terms opacum and pellucidum, told us, after some hesitation, that opacum was, as one might say, opake, and that pellucidum signified pellucid. Such was the dexterity with which this learned reader facilitated to his auditors the intricacies of science, and so true is it, that a man may know what he cannot teach

Boerhaute complains, that the writers who have treated of chymistry before him, are useless to the greater part of students, because they presuppose their readers to have such degrees of skill as are not often to be found. Into the same errour are all men apt to fall, who have familiarized any subject to themselves in solitude: they discourse, as if they thought every other man had been employed in the same inquiries, and expect that short hints and obscure allusions will produce in others the same train of ideas which they excite in themselves with an opinion that pleases him, he catches it up with eagerness, looks only after such arguments as tend to his confirmation or spares himself the trouble of discussion and adopts it with very little proof indulges it long without suspicion, and in time unites it to the general body of his knowledge and transures it up among incontestible truths but when he comes into the world among men who, arguing upon dissimilar principles, have been led to different conclusions, and being placed in various situations view the same object on many sides, he finds his darling position attacked, and himself in no condition to defend it having thought always in one train, he is in the state of a man who having fenced always with the same master, is perplexed and amazed by a new posture of his antagonist. he is entringled in unexpected difficulties, he is harassed by sudden objections he is unprovided with solutions or replies his surprise impedes his natural powers of reasoning, his thoughts are scattered and confounded and he gratifies the pride of ary petulance with an easy victory

It is difficult to imagine with what obstinacy truths which one mind perceives almost by intuition will be rejected by another and how many attrices must be practised to procure admission for the most evident propositions into understandings frighted by their noticity or hardened against them by accidental prejudice, it can scarcely be conceived, how frequently, in these extemporaneous controversies the dull will be subtle and the acute absurd how often stupidity will clude the force of argument by involving itself in its own gloom, and mistaken in genuity

genuity will weave aitful fallacies, which reason can searcely find means to disentangle

In these encounters the learning of the recluse usually fails him nothing but long habit and frequent experiments can confer the power of changing a position into various forms, presenting it in different points of view, connecting it with known and granted truths, fortifying it with intelligible arguments, and illustrating it by apt similitudes, and he, therefore, that has collected his knowledge in solitude, must learn its application by mixing with mankind

But while the various opportunities of conversation invite us to try every mode of argument, and every ait of recommending our sentiments, we are frequently betrayed to the use of such as are not in themselves strictly defensible · a man heated in talk, and eager of victory, takes advantage of the mistakes or ignorance of his adversary, lays hold of concessions to which he knows he has no right, and urges proofs likely to prevail in his opponent, though he knows himself that they have no force: thus the severity of reason is relaxed, many topicks are accumulated, but without just airangement or distinction; we learn to satisfy ourselves with such natiocination as silences others, and seldom recal to a close examination, that discourse which has gratified our vanity with victory and applause

Some caution therefore must be used, lest copiousness and facility be made less valuable by inaccuracy and confusion. To fix the thoughts by writing, and subject them to frequent examinations and reviews, is the best method of enabling the mind to detect its own sophisms, and keep it on guard against the fallacies which it practises on others—in conversation we naturally diffuse our thoughts, and in writing we contract them, method is the excellence of writing, and unconstraint the grace of conversation

To read, write and converse in due proportions, is therefore the business of a man of letters. For all these there is not often equal opportunity, excellence, therefore, is not often attainable, and most men fail in one or other of the ends proposed, and are full without readiness, or ready without exactness. Some deficiency must be forgiven all, because all are men, and more must be allowed to pass uncensured in the greater part of the world, because none can confeit upon himself abilities, and few have the choice of situations proper for the improvement of those which nature has bestowed, it is however reasonable, to have perfection in our eye, that we may always advance towards it, though we know it never can be reached.

SIR.

In the papers of criticism which you have given to the publick, I have remarked a spirit of candour and love love of truth, equally remote from bigotry and captiousness, a just distribution of praise amongst the ancients and the moderns, a sober deference to reputation long established, without a blind adoration of antiquity, and a willingness to favour later performances, without a light or puerile fondness for novelty.

I shall, therefore, venture to lay before you, such observations as have risen to my mind in the consideration of Virgil's pastorals, without any inquiry how far my sentiments deviate from established rules or common opinions

If we survey the ten pastorals in a general view, it will be found that Virgil can derive from them very little claim to the praise of an inventor. To search into the antiquity of this kind of poetry, is not my present purpose; that it has long subsisted in the east, the Sacred Writings sufficiently inform us; and we may conjecture, with great probability, that it was sometimes the devotion, and sometimes the entertainment of the first generations of mankind. Theocritus united elegance with simplicity, and taught his shepherds to sing with so much ease and harmony, that his countrymen despairing to excel, forbore to imitate him, and the Greeks, however vain or ambitious, left him in quiet possession of the garlands which the wood nymphs had bestowed upon him

Virgil, however, taking advantage of another language, ventured to copy or to rival the Sicilian bard: he has written with greater splendour of diction, and elevation of sentiment but as the magnificence of his performances was more, the simplicity was less; and, perhaps, where he excels Theoritus, he sometimes obtains his superiority by deviating from the pastoral character, and performing what Theocratus nevel attempted

Yet, though I would willingly pay to Theocritus the honour which is always due to an original author I am far from intending to depreciate Virgil, of whom Horace justly declares, that the rural muses have appropriated to him their elegance and sweetness, and who, as he copied Theocritus in his design, has resembled him likewise in his success 'for, if we except Calphurnius an obscure author of the lower ages I know not that a single pastoral was written after him by any poet till the regulal of literature

But though his general ment has been universally acknowledged. I am far from thinking all the productions of his rural Thaha equally excellent there is indeed in all his pastorals a strun of versification which it is vain to seek in any other poet but if we except the first and the tenth, they seem liable either wholly or in part to considerable objections.

The second though we should forget the great charge against it; which I am ifiaid can never be re fitted, might, I think, have perished, without any diminution of he pruse of its author, for I know not that it contains one affecting sentiment or pleasing description, or one passage that strikes the imagination or aw items the passions

The third contains a contest between two shep heids, begun with a quarrel of which some particulars might well be spared, carried on with sprightlines and elegance, and terminated at last in a reconciliation but sprely whether the invectives with which they attack each other be true or false they are too much degraded from the dignity of pastoral innocence; and instead of rejoicing that they are both victorious, I should not have grieved could they have been both defeated

The poem to Pollio is, indeed, of another kind. it is filled with images at once splendid and pleasing, and is elevated with grandeur of language worthy of the first of Roman poets, but I am not able to reconcile myself to the disproportion between the performance, and the occasion that produced it: that the golden age should return because Pollio had a son, appears so wild a fiction, that I am ready to suspect the poet of having written, for some other purpose, what he took this opportunity of producing to the publick

The fifth contains a celebration of Daphnis, which has stood to all succeeding ages as the model of pastoral elegies. To deny praise to a performance which so many thousands have laboured to imitate, would be to judge with too little deference for the opinion of mankind: yet whoever shall read it with impartiality, will find that most of the images are of the mythological kind, and therefore, easily invented; and that there are few sentiments of rational praise or natural lamentation

In the Silenus he again rises to the dignity of philosophick sentiments, and heroick poetry. The address to Varus is eminently beautiful but since the compliment paid to Gallus fixes the transaction to his own time, the fiction of Silenus seems injudicious nor has any sufficient reason yet been found, to justify his choice of those fables that make the subject of the song.

The seventh exhibits another contest of the tuneful shepherds—and, surely, it is not without some reproach to his inventive power—that of ten pastorals Fingil his written two upon the same plan. One of the shepherds now gains an acknowledged victory but without any apparent superiority and the reader when he sees the prize adjudged, is not able to discover how it was deserved.

Of the eighth postoral so little is properly the work of Firgil, that he has no claim to other praise or blame than that of a translator

Of the ninth it is scale possible to discover the design or tendency it is said, I know not upon what authority, to have been composed from fragments of other poems, and except a few lines in which the nuthor to ches upon his own misfortunes there is nothing that seems appropriated to any time or place or of which any other use can be discovered than to fill up the poem

The first and the tenth postorals whatever be de termined of the rest, are sufficient to place their author above the reach of malry. The complaint of Gall is disappointed in his love as full of such sentiments as disappointed love naturally produces. his wishes are vild his resentment is tender, and his purposes are inconstant. In the genuine language of despair he sooths himself awhile with the pity that shall be paid him after his death.

Tarren cantabilis, Arcades inquit
Montibus hac estris soli cantare periti
Arcades O milu tum quam-molliter ossa quiescant
I estra meos olim si fistula dicot amores!

Yet, O Arcadian swams,
Ye best artificers of soothing strains!
Tune your soft reeds, and teach your rocks my woes,
So shall my shade in sweeter rest repose.
O that your birth and business had been mine,
To feed the flock, and prune the spreading vine!
WARTON

Discontented with his present condition, and desirous to be any thing but what he is, he wishes himself one of the shepheids. He then catches the idea of rural tranquillity, but soon discovers how much happier he should be in these happy regions, with Lycoris at his side:

Hic gehdi fontes, hic mollia prata, Lycori ·
Hic nemus, hic ipso tecum consumerer aco.
Nunc insanus amoi duri me Martis in aimis,
Tela inter media, atque adversos detinet hostes.
Tu procul a patria (nec sit milu credere) tantum
Alpinas, ah dura, nives, & frigore Rheni
Me sine sola vides. Ah te ne frigora lædant!
Ah tibi ne teneras glacies secet aspera plantas!

Here cooling fountains roll thro' flow'ry meads,
Here woods, Lycoris, lift their verdant heads,
Here could I wear my careless life away,
And in thy arms insensibly decay
Instead of that, me frantick love detains
'Mid foes, and dreadful darts, and bloody plains
While you and can my soul the tale believe,
Far from your country, lonely wand'ring leave
Me, me your lover, barbarous fugitive!
Seek the rough Alps where snows eternal shine,
And joyless borders of the frozen Rhine
Ah! may no cold e'er blast my dearest maid,
Nor pointed ice thy tender feet invade! Warton.

He then turns his thoughts on every side, in quest of something that may soluce or amuse him he pro poses happiness to himself, first in one scene and then in another and at last finds that nothing will satisfy

Jam neque Hamudryades rursum, nec carmina nobis Ipsa placent ipsa rursum concedite sylvæ, Non illum nostri possunt mutare labores Nec si frigoribus medus Hebrunque bibamus, Seithiomasque nices hyemis subcamus aquosæ Nec si, cum morieus alla liber aret in ulmo, Ethiopum versemus oves sub sidere Cancri, Omnia vincil amor et nos cedamus amori

But now again no more the woodland maids,
Nor pastoral songs delight—I riewell ye shades—
No toils of ours the cruel god can change
Tho lost in frozen deserts we should range
Tho we should drink where chilling Hebrus flows Endure bleak winter blasts, and Thracian snows,
Or on hot Indias plains our flocks should teed
Where the parch delin declines his sickening head,
Beneath fierce glowing Canters fiery beams,
Far from cool breezes and refreshing streams
Love over all maintains resistless sway,
And let us love s all conquering power obey

WARTON

But notwithstanding the excellence of the tenth pastoral, I cannot forbe it to give the preference to the first which is equally natural and more diversified. The complaint of the shepherd, who saw his old companion at ease in the shade while himself was driving his little flock he knew not whither, is such as with variation of circumstances, misery always utters at the sight of prosperity.

His account of the difficulties of his journey, gives a very tender image of pastoral distress.

The description of Virgil's happiness in his little farm, combines almost all the images of rural pleasure, and he, therefore, that can read it with indifference, has no sense of pastoral poetry.

WAPTON

It may be observed that these two poems were produced by events that really happened, and may, therefore be of use to prove that we can always feel more than we can imagine, and that the most artful fiction must give way to truth

DUBIUS

Numb 95 Tulsday, October 2, 1753.

Dulcique animos novitate tenebo Ovin

It is often charged upon writers, that with all their pretensions to genius and discoveries, they do little more than copy one another, and that compositions obtruded upon the world with the pomp of novelty, contain only tedious repetitions of common sentiments, or at best exhibit a transposition of known images, and give a new appearance to truth only by some slight difference of dress and decoration

The allegation of resemblance between authors, is indisputably true; but the charge of plagiarism, which is raised upon it, is not to be allowed with equal readiness A coincidence of sentiment may easily happen without any communication, since there are many occasions in which all reasonable men will nearly think alike Writers of all ages have had the same sentiments, because they have in all ages had the same objects of speculation, the interests and passions, the virtues and vices of mankind, have been diversified in different times, only by unessential and casual varieties, and we must, therefore, expect in the works of all those who attempt to describe them, such a likeness as we find in the pictures of the same person drawn in different periods of his life.

It is necessary, therefore, that before an author be charged with plagiarism, one of the most reproach ful, though, perhaps not the most atrocious of lite rary crimes the subject on which he treats should be carefully considered We do not wonder, that historians relating the same facts agree in their narration, or that authors, delivering the elements of science advance the same theorems and lay down the same definitions yet it is not wholly without use to mankind, that books are multiplied, and that different authors lay out their labours on the same subject, for there will always be some reason why one should on particular occasions or to particular persons, be preferable to another, some will be clear where others are obscure, some will please by their style and others by their method, some by their em bellishments and others by their simplicity, some by closeness and others by diffusion

The same indulgence is to be shown to the writers of morality right and wrong are immutable, and those therefore, who teach us to distinguish them, if they all teach us right must agree with one another. The relations of social life and the duties resulting from them, must be the same at all times and in all nations some petty differences may be indeed produced, by forms of government or arbitrary customs, but the general doctrine can receive no alteration.

Yet it is not to be desired, that morality should be considered as interdicted to all future writers—men will always be tempted to deviate from their duty, and will, therefore always want a monitor to recall them, and a new book often seizes the attention of the publick—without any other claim than that it is new

There is likewise in composition, as in other things, a perpetual vicissitude of fashion, and truth is recommended at one time to regard, by appearances which at another would expose it to neglect, the author, therefore, who has judgment to discern the taste of his contemporaries, and skill to gratify it, will have always an opportunity to deserve well of mankind, by conveying instruction to them in a grateful vehicle

There are likewise many modes of composition, by which a moralist may deserve the name of an original writer he may familiarise his system by dialogues after the manner of the ancients, or subtilize it into a series of syllogistic arguments he may enforce his doctrine by seriousness and solemnity, or enliver it by sprightliness and gayety, he may deliver his sentiments in naked precepts, or illustrate them by historical examples, he may detain the studious by the artful concatenation of a continued discourse, or relieve the busy by short strictures, and unconnected essays

To excel in any of these forms of writing will require a particular cultivation of the genius, whoever can attain to excellence, will be certain to engage a set of readers, whom no other method would have equally allured, and he that communicates truth with success, must be numbered among the first benefactors to mankind

The same observation may be extended likewise to the passions—their influence is uniform, and their effects nearly the same in every human breast—a man loves and hates, desires and avoids, exactly like his neighbour, resentment and ambition, availage and indolence, indolence discoverthemselves by the same symptoms in minds distant a thousand years from one another

Nothing, therefore can be more unjust than to charge an author with plagraism, merely because he assigns to every cause its natural effect and makes his personages act as others in like circumstances have always done There are conceptions in which all men will agree though each derives them from his own observation whoever has been in love will represent a lover impatient of every idea that interrupts his meditations on his mistress, retiring to shades and solitude that he may muse without disturbance on his approaching happiness, or associating himself with some friend that flatters his passion and talking away the hours of absence upon his darling subject Whoever has been so unhappy as to have felt the miseries of long continued hatred will, without any assistance from ancient volumes beable to relate how the passions are kept in perpetual agi tation, by the recollection of injury and meditations of revenge, how the blood boils at the name of the enemy and life is worn away in contrivances of mischief

Every other passion is alike simple and limited, if it be considered only with regard to the breast which it inhabits the anatomy of the mind as that of the body, must perpetually exhibit the same appearances, and though by the continued industry of successive inquirers, new movements will be from time to time discovered they can affect only the minuter parts and are commonly of more curosity than importance

It will now be natural to inquire by what acts are the writers of the present and future ages to attract the notice and favour of mankind. They are to observe the alterations which time is always making in the modes of life, that they may gratify every generation with a picture of themselves Thus love is uniform, but courtship is perpetually varying: the different arts of gallantry, which beauty has inspired, would of themselves be sufficient to fill a volume; sometimes balls and serenades, sometimes tournaments and adventures, have been employed to melt the hearts of ladies, who in another century have been sensible of scarce any other merit than that of riches, and listened only to jointures and pin-money. Thus the ambitious man has at all times been eager of wealth and power; but these hopes have been gratified in some countries by supplicating the people, and in others by flattering the prince. honour in some states has been only the reward of military achievements, in others it has been gained by noisy turbulence and popular clamours Avarice has woin a different form, as she actuated the usurer of Rome, and the stockjobber of England; and idleness itself, how little soever inclined to the trouble of invention, has been forced from time to time to change its amusements, and contrive different methods of wearing out the day

Here then is the fund, from which those who study mankind may fill their compositions with an inexhaustible variety of images and allusions; and he must be confessed to look with little attention upon scenes thus perpetually changing, who cannot catch some of the figures before they are made vulgar by reiterated descriptions

It has been discovered by Sir Isaac Newton, that the distinct and primogenial colours are only seven. but every eye can witness, that from various mixtures, in various proportions infinite diversifications of tints may be produced. In like manner, the passions of the mind, which put the world in motion, and produce all the bustle and engerness of the busy crowds that swarm upon the earth the passions, from whence arise all the pleasures and prins that we see and hear of, if we analyse the mind of man, are very few, but those few agat sted and combined. as external causes shall happen to operate, and modified by prevailing opinions and accidental caprices, make such frequent alterations on the surface of life, that the show, while we are busied in delineating it, vanishes from the view, and a new set of objects succeed doomed to the same shortness of duration with the former thus curiosity may always find employment, and the busy part of mankind will furnish the contemplative with the materials of specu lation to the end of time

The complaint, therefore that all topicks are preoccupied, is nothing more than the murmur of ignorance or idline s, by which some discourage others and some themselves, the mutability of mankind will always furnish writers with new images, and the luxuranceof funcy may always embellish them with new decorations

Tuesday, October 16, 1753. Numb. 99

Magnis tamen cicidit ausis.

Ovid.

But in the glorious enterprize he dy'd.

Addison.

Ir has always been the practice of mankind, to judge of actions by the event The same attempts, conducted in the same manner, but terminated by different success, produce different judgments. they who attain their wishes, never want celebrators of their wisdom and their virtue, and they that miscarry, are quickly discovered to have been defective not only in mental but in moral qualities. The world will never be long without some good reason to hate the unhappy: their real faults are immediately detected, and if those are not sufficient to sink them into infamy, an additional weight of calumny will be superadded he that fails in his endeavours after wealth or power, will not long retain either honesty or courage

This species of injustice has so long prevailed in universal practice, that it seems likewise to have infected speculation so few minds are able to separate the ideas of greatness and prosperity, that even Sir William Temple has determined, "that he who can " deserve the name of a hero, must not only be vir-

" tuous but fortunate

By this unreasonable distribution of praise and blame, none have suffered oftener than projectors, whose whose rapidity of immaintain and vastness of design ruse such entry in their fellow most also that every eye watches for their fall and every heart exalts at their distresses a veteven a projector may give favour by success, and the tongue that was prepared to his sither endeavours to excel others in loudings of appliance.

When Corrolanus, in Shalespeare deserted to Antidius the Folseian ervints at first insulted him, even while he stood under the projection of the household gods, but when they saw that the project took effect, and the stringer was ented at the head of the table one of them very judiciously observes "that he always thought there was more in him "than he could think

Machia el li is justly anim diverted on the different notice tiken by ill ucceeding times of the two great projectors. Catiline and Crear—Both formed the same project—ind intended to ruse themselves to power by subverting the commonwealth—they pursued their design, perhaps—with equal abilities and with equal virtue—but Catiline perished in the field—and Cesar returned from Pharsalia with un limited authority—and from that time, every monarch of the earth—has thought himself—honoured by a comparison with Cesar—and Catiline has been never mentioned, but that his name—might be applied to traitors and incendingers.

In an age more remote, Xerres projected the conquest of Greece, and brought down the power of Asia against it but after the world had been filled with expectation and terrour his army was beaten, his fleet was destroyed and Xerres has been never mentioned without contempt

A few years afterwards, Greece likewise had her turn of giving bith to a projector; who invading Asia with a small army, went forward in search of adventures, and by his escape from one danger, gained only more rashness to rush into another: he stormed city after city, overran kingdom after kingdom, fought battles only for barren victory, and invaded nations only that he might make his way through them to new invasions: but having been fortunate in the execution of his projects, he died with the name of Alexander the Great.

These are, indeed, events of ancient times, but human nature is always the same, and every age will afford us instances of publick censures influenced by events. The great business of the middle centuries, was the holy war, which undoubtedly was a noble project, and was for a long time prosecuted with a spirit equal to that with which it had been contrived: but the ardour of the European heroes only hurried them to destruction; for a long time they could not gain the territories for which they fought, and, when at last gained, they could not keep them. their expeditions, therefore, have been the scoff of idleness and ignorance, their understanding and their virtue have been equally vilified, their conduct has been ridiculed, and their cause has been defamed

When Columbus had engaged king Ferdinand in the discovery of the other hemisphere, the sailors, with whom he embarked in the expedition, had so little confidence in their commander, that after having been long at sea looking for coasts which they expected never to find, they raised a general mutiny, and demanded to return He found means to sooth them into a permission to continue the same course three days longer, and on the evening of the third day descried land. If id the impatience of his crew denied him a few hours of the time requested, which had been his fate but to have come back with the infamy of a vain projector, who had betrayed the king's credulity to useless expenses, and risked his his in seeking countries that had no existence? how would those that had rejected his proposals have triumphed in their acuteness? and when would his name have been mentioned, but with the makers of potable gold and malleable gliss?

The last royal projectors with whom the world has been troubled, were Charles of Sceden and the Czar of Muscory Charles if my judgment may be formed of his designs by his measures and his inquiries, had purposed first to dethrone the Czar, then to lead his army through pathless deserts into China, thence to make his way by the sword through the whole circuit of Asia, and by the conquest of Turkey to unite Sweden with his new dominions but this mighty project was crushed at Pullova, and Charles his since been considered as a madman by those powers, who sent their ambassadors to solicit his friendship, and their generals "to learn under him the art of war

The Czar found employment sufficient in his own dominions, and amused lumself in digging carals, and building cities, murdering his subjects with insufficiable fatigues and transplanting nations from one corner of his dominions to another without regieting the thousands that perished on the way but he attained his end he made his people formidable, and is numbered by fune among the demi gods

I am far from intending to vindicate the sanguinary projects of heroes and conquerors, and would wish rather to diminish the reputation of their success, than the infamy of their miscarriages. for I cannot conceive, why he that has burnt cities, wasted nations, and filled the world with horiour and desolation, should be more kindly regarded by mankind, than he that died in the rudiments of wickedness; why he that accomplished mischief should be glorious, and he that only endeavoured it should be criminal I would wish Casar and Catiline, Xerries and Alerander, Charles and Peter, huddled together in obscurity or detestation

But there is another species of projectors, to whom I would willingly conciliate mankind, whose ends are generally laudable, and whose labours are innocent, who are searching out new powers of nature, or contriving new works of ait, but who are yet persecuted with incessant obloquy, and whom the universal contempt with which they are treated, often debars from that success which their industry would obtain, if it were permitted to act without opposition

They who find themselves inclined to censure new undertakings, only because they are new, should consider, that the folly of projection is very seldom the folly of a fool, it is commonly the ebullition of a capacious mind, crowded with variety of knowledge, and heated with intenseness of thought, it proceeds often from the consciousness of uncommon powers, from the confidence of those, who having already done much, are easily persuaded that they can do more. When Rowley had completed the orrery, he attempted the perpetual motion, when Boyle

Boyle had exhausted the secrets of yulgar chymistry, he turned his thoughts to the work of transmutation

A projector generally unites those qualities which have the furest claim to veneration extent of knowledge, and greatness of design at was said of Catilane, immoder ita, incredibilin minis alto semper cupicies. Projectors of all kinds agree in their intellects though they differ in their morals they all full by attempting things beyond their power, by despising vulgar attenuments, and aspiring to performances to which perhaps nature has not proportioned the force of man when they full, therefore, they full not by idleness or timidity, but by rash adventure and fruitless diligence

That the attempts of such men will often miscarry we may reasonably expect, yet from such men and such only, are we to hope for the cultivation of those parts of nature which he vet wiste and the invention of those arts which are yet wanting to the felicity of life If they me, therefore, universally discouraged art and discovery can make no advances Whatever is attempted without previous certainty of success, may be considered as a project, and amongst narrow minds may, therefore expose its author to censure and contempt and if the liberty of laughing be once indulged every man will laugh at what he does not understand every project will be considered as madness and every great or new design will be consured as a project.
Men, unaccustomed to reason and rescarches, think every enterprise impracticable which is extended beyond common effects, or comprises many intermediate operations. Many that presume to laugh at projectors, would consider a flight through the air in a winged chariot, and the movement of a mighty engine by the stream of water, as equally the dreams of mechanic lunacy, and would hear, with equal negligence, of the union of the Thames and Severn by a canal, and the scheme of Albuquerque, the Viceroy of the Indies, who in the rage of hostility had contrived to make Egypt a barren desert, by tunning the Nile into the Red Sea

Those who have attempted much, have seldom failed to perform more than those who never deviate from the common roads of action many valuable preparations of chymistry are supposed to have risen from unsuccessful inquiries after the grand elixir. It is, therefore, just to encourage those who endeavour to enlarge the power of art, since they often succeed beyond expectation, and when they fail, may sometimes benefit the world even by their miscarriages.

SIR,

I have been for many years a trader in London My beginning was narrow, and my stock small, I was therefore a long time brow be iten and despised by those who having more money thought they had more ment than myself. I did not, however, suffer my resentment to instigate me to any mean arts of supplantation nor my eagerness of riches to betray me to any indirect methods of gain, I pursued my business with incessant assidiaty supported by the hope of being one day richer than those who con termed me, and had upon every annual review of my books the satisfaction of finding my fortune in creased beyond my expectation

In a few years my industry and probity were fully recompensed, my wealth was really great, and my reputation for wealth still greater. I had large warehouses crouded with goods and considerable sums in the publick funds, I was caressed upon the Vol. III. O. Exchance

Exchange by the most emment merchants; became the oracle of the common council, was solicited to engage in all commercial undertakings; was flattered with the hopes of becoming in a short time one of the directors of a wealthy company, and, to complete my mercantile honours, enjoyed the expensive happiness of fining for sheriff

Riches, you know, easily produce riches when I had arrived to this degree of wealth, I had no longer any obstruction or opposition to fear; new acquisitions were hourly brought within my reach, and I continued for some years longer to heap thousands upon thousands

At last I resolved to complete the circle of a citizen's prosperity by the purchase of an estate in the country, and to close my life in retirement. From the hour that this design entered my imagination, I found the fatigues of my employment every day more oppressive, and persuaded myself that I was no longer equal to perpetual attention, and that my health would soon be destroyed by the torment and distraction of extensive business. I could image to myself no happiness, but in vacant jollity, and uninterrupted leisure, nor entertain my friends with any other topick, than the vexation and uncertainty of trade, and the happiness of rural privacy.

But notwithstanding these declarations, I could not at once reconcile myself to the thoughts of ceasing to get money, and though I was every day inquiring for a purchase, I found some reason for rejecting all that were offered me, and, indeed, had accumulated so many beauties and conveniencies in my idea of the spot where I was finally to be happy, that, perhaps the world might have been travelled over without discovery of a place which would not have been defective in some particular

Thus I went on still talking of retirement, and still refusing to retire, my friends began to laugh at my delays and I grew ashamed to trifle longer with my own inclinations, an estate was at length purchased, I transferred my stock to a prudent young man who had married my daughter, went down into the country, and commenced load of a spacious manor

Here for some time I found happiness equal to my I reformed the old house according to the advice of the best architects. I threw down the walls of the garden, and enclosed it with pali sades planted long avenues of trees, filled a green house with exotick plants, due a new canal, and threw the earth into the old mont

The fame of these expensive improvements brought in all the country to see the show I entertained my visitors with great liberality, led them round my gardens, showed them my apartments, laid before them plans for new decorations, and was gratified by the wonder of some and the envy of others

I was envied, but how little can one min judge of the condition of another! The time was now coming, in which affluence and splendour could no longer make me pleased with myself I had built till the imagination of the architect was exhausted. I had added one convenience to inother, till I knew not what more to wish or to design I had laid out my gaidens planted my park and completed my waterworks, and what now remained to be done? what. what, but to look up to turiets, of which when they were once raised I had no further use, to range over apartments where time was turnishing the furniture, to stand by the cascade of which I scarcely now perceived the sound, and to watch the growth of woods that must give their shade to a distant generation

In this gloomy mactivity, is every day begun and ended the happiness that I have been so long procuring is now at an end, because it has been procured, I wander from room to room, till I am weary of myself, I ride out to a neighbouring hill in the centre of my estate, from whence all my lands he in prospect round me, I see nothing that I have not seen before, and return home disappointed, though I knew that I had nothing to expect

In my happy days of business I had been accustomed to use early in the morning, and remember the time when I grieved that the night came so soon upon me, and obliged me for a few hours to shut out affluence and prosperity I now seldom see the using sun, but to "tell him," with the fallen angel, "how I hate his beams" I awake from sleep as to languor or imprisonment, and have no employment for the first how but to consider by what art I shall rid myself of the second I piotiact the breakfast as long as I can, because when it is ended I have no call for my attention, till I can with some degree of decency grow impatient for my dinner If I could dine all my life, I should be happy, I eat not because I am hungry, but because I am idle but, alas! the time quickly comes when I can eat no longer, and so ill does my constitution second my inclination, that that I cannot bear strong liquors—seven hours must then be endured before I shall sup—but supper comes at last, the more welcome as it is in a short time suc ceeded by sleep

Such Mr Adventurer is the happiness, the hope of which seduced me from the duties and ple is ures of a mercantile life. I shall be told by those who read my narritive, that there are many means of innocent amusement, and many schemes of useful employment, which I do not appear ever to have known and that nature and art have provided pleasures by which without the drudgery of settled business the active may be engaged, the solitary soothed and the social entertuned

These arts, Sir, I have tried When first I took possession of my estate, in conformity to the taste of my neighbours, I bought guns and nets filled my kennel with dogs and my stable with horses but a little experience showed me that these instruments of rural felicity would afford me few gratifica tions I never shot but to miss the mark, and, to confess the truth, was afrud of the fire of my own gun I could discover no musicl in the city of the dogs nor could divest myself of pity for the animal whose perceful and moffensive life was sacrificed to our sport I was not, indeed always at leisure to reflect upon her danger, for my horse who had been bred to the chase, did not always regard my choice either of speed or way, but leaped hedges and ditches at his own discretion, and hurried me along with the dogs, to the great diversion of my brother sportsmen His eagerness of pursuit once incited him to swim a mer, and I had lessure to resolve in the water that I would never hazard my life again for the destruction of a hare

I then ordered books to be procured, and by the direction of the vices had in a few weels a close elegantly furnished. You will, perhaps, be surprised when I shall tell you, that when once I had ranged them according to their sizes, and piled them up in regular gradations, I had received all the pleasure which they could give me. I am not able to excite in myself any curiosity after events which have been long passed, and in which I can therefore have no interest, I am utterly unconcerned to know whether Tully or Demosthenes excelled in oratory, whether Hannibal lost Italy by his own negligence or the corruption of his countrymen. I have no skill in controversial learning, not can conceive why so many volumes should have been written upon questions, which I have fixed so long and so happily without understanding. I once resolved to go through the volumes relating to the office of justice of the peace, but found them so crabbed and intricate, that in less than a month I desisted in despair, and resolved to supply my deficiencies by paying a competent salary to a skilful clerk

I am naturally inclined to hospitality, and for some time kept up a constant intercourse of visits with the neighbouring gentlemen: but though they are easily brought about me by better wine than they can find at any other house, I am not much relieved by their conversation, they have no skill in commerce or the stocks, and I have no knowledge of the history of families or the factions of the country; so that when the first civilities are over, they usually talk

talk to one another and I am left alone in the midst of the company. Though I cannot dunk myself, I am obliged to encourage the circulation of the glass, their mirth grows more turbulent and obstreperous, and before their merriment is at an end, I am sick with disgust, and, perhaps reproached with my so briety, or by some sly insinuations insulted as a cit

Such, Mr Adventurer, is the life to which I am condemned by a foolish endeavour to be happy by imitation, such is the happiness to which I pleased myself with approaching and which I considered as the chief end of my cares and my labours. I toiled year after year with cheerfulness, in expectation of the happy hour in which I might be idle, the privilege of idleness is attained, but has not brought with it the blessing of tranquillity.

Ι nm,

And of their vain disputings find no end

It has been sometimes asked by those, who find the appearance of wisdom more easily attained by questions than solutions, how it comes to pass, that the world is divided by such difference of opinion, and why men, equally reasonable, and equally lovers of truth, do not always think in the same manner?

With regard to simple propositions, where the terms are understood, and the whole subject is comprehended at once, there is such an uniformity of sentiment among all human beings, that, for many ages, a very numerous set of notions were supposed to be innate, or necessarily coexistent with the faculty of reason it being imagined, that universal agreement could proceed only from the invariable dictates of the universal parent

In questions diffuse and compounded, this similarity of determination is no longer to be expected. At our first sally into the intellectual world, we all march together along one straight and open road, but as we proceed further, and wider prospects open to our view, every eye fixes upon a different scene, we divide into various paths, and, as we move forward, are still at a greater distance from each other. As a question becomes nore complicated and involved, and extends to a greater number of relations, disagreement of opinion will always be multiplied, not because we are trational, but because we are finite beings, furnished with different kinds of knowledge, exerting different degrees of attention, one discovering conequences which escape another, none taking in the whole concatenation of causes and effects, and most comprehending but a very small part, each comparing what he observes with a different criterion, and each referring it to a different purpose

Where then, is the wonder, that they who see only a small part, should judge erroneously of the whole? or that they, who see different and dissimilar parts, should judge differently from each other?

Whatever has various respects must have various appearances of good and evil beauty or deformity thus, the gurdener tears up as a weed, the plant which the play stein gathers as a medicine, and "ageneral says Sir Kanelim Digby, "will look with pleasure over "a plain, as a fit place on which the fate of empires "might be decided in battle which the farmer will despise as bleak and barren, neither fruitful of pas "turage, nor fit for tillage"

Two men examining the same question proceed commonly like the physici in and gardener in selecting herbs, or the farmer and hero looking on the plan, they bring minds impressed with different notions and direct their inquiries to different ends they form, therefore contrary conclusions, and each wonders at the other's ibsurdity.

We have less reason to be surprised or offended when we find others differ from us in opinion, because choice

we very often differ from ourselves. How often we alter our minds, we do not always remark; because the change is sometimes made imperceptibly and gradually, and the last conviction effaces all memory of the former yet every man, accustomed from time to time to take a survey of his own notions, will by a slight retrospection be able to discover, that his mind has suffered many revolutions, that the same things have in the several parts of his life been condemned and approved, pursued and shunned: and that on many occasions, even when his practice has been steady, his mind has been wavening, and he has persisted in a scheme of action, rather because he feared the censure of inconstancy, than because he was always pleased with his own

Of the different faces shown by the same objects as they are viewed on opposite sides, and of the different inclinations which they must constantly raise in him that contemplates them, a more striking example cannot easily be found than two Greck epigrammatists will afford us in their accounts of human life, which I shall lay before the reader in English prose

Posidippus, a comick poet, utters this complaint; "Through which of the paths of life is it eligible to "pass? In publick assemblies are debates and troublesome affairs, domestick privacies are haunted "with anxieties. in the country is labour, on the sea is terrour in a foreign land, he that has "money must live in fear, he that wants it must "pine in distress are you married? you are troubled "with suspicions; are you single? you languish in "solitude;

"solitude, children occasion toil, and a childless hife is a state of destitution the time of youth is a time of folly and gray hairs are loaded with infilmity. This choice only therefore, can be made either never to receive being or immediately to lose it."

Such and so gloomy is the prospect which Posidippus has laid before us. But we are not to acquiesce too hastily in his determination against the value of existence for Metrodorus, a philosopher of Athens has shown, that life has pleasures as well as pains and having exhibited the present state of man in brighter colours draws with equal appearance of reason, a contrary conclusion

'You may pass well through any of the paths of life. In publick assemblies are honours and transactions of wisdom in domestick privacy is stillness and quiet in the country are the beauties of nature on the sea is the hope of gain in a foreign land, he that is rich is honoured he that is poor may keep his poverty secret are you married? you have a cheerful house, are you single? you are unincumbered, children are objects of affection, to be without children is to be without care the time of youth is the time of vigour, and gray hairs are mide venerable by piety. It will, therefore never be a wise mans choice, weither not to obtain existence, or to lose it, for every state of life has its felicity?

In these epigiams are included most of the questions which have engaged the speculations of the inquires after happiness and though they will not much assist our determinations, they may perhaps, equally equally promote our quiet, by showing that no absolute determination ever can be formed

Whether a publick station, or private life be desirable, has always been debated. We see here both the allurements and discouragements of civil employments on one side there is trouble, on the other honour, the management of affairs is vexatious and difficult, but it is the only duty in which wisdom can be conspicuously displayed it must then still be left to every man to choose either ease or glory; nor can any general precept be given, since no man can be happy by the prescription of another

Thus, what is said of children by Posidippus, "that they are occasions of fatigue," and by Metrodorus, "that they are objects of affection," is equally certain, but whether they will give most pain or pleasure, must depend on their future conduct and dispositions, on many causes over which the parent can have little influence—there is, therefore, room for all the caprices of imagination, and desire must be proportioned to the hope or fear that shall happen to predominate

Such is the uncertainty in which we are always likely to remain with regard to questions wherein we have most interest, and which every day affords us fresh opportunity to examine we may examine, indeed, but we never can decide, because our faculties are unequal to the subject we see a little, and form an opinion, we see more, and change it.

sentiments if they are deceived, we have no right to attribute their mistake to obstinacy or negligence because we likewise have been mistaken, we may, perhaps again change our own opinion, and what excuse shall we be able to find for aversion and malignity conceived against him, whom we shall then find to have committed no fault, and who offended us only by refusing to follow us into errour?

It may likewise contribute to soften that re entment which pride naturally raises against opposition, if we consider, that he who differs from us, does not always contradict us, he has one view of an object, and we have another, each describes what he sees with equal fidelity and each regulates his steps by his own eves out man with Posidif pus, looks on celibacy as a state of gloomy solitude, without a partner in joy, or a comforter in sorrow, the other considers it, with Metrodorus as a state free from incumbrances in which a man is at liberty to choose his own gratifications to remove from place to place in quest of pleasure, and to think of nothing but meiriment and diversion full of these notions one hastens to choose a wife, and the other laughs at his ra liness or pities his agnorance yet it is possible that each is right, but that each is right only for himself

Life is not the object of science we see a little, very little, and what is beyond we only can conjecture. If we inquire of those who have gone before us, we receive small satisfaction—some have travelled life without ob ervation, and .ome willingly misle id us. The only thought, therefore, on which we can repose with comfort, is that which presents to us the care of Piovidence, whose eye takes in the whole of things, and under whose direction all involuntary erious will terminate in happiness.

Nobis, cum simul occidit bieris lur, Nox est perpetuo una doi mienda

CATULLUS.

When once the short-liv'd mortal dies, A night eternal seals his eyes

Addison.

It may have been observed by every reader, that there are certain topicks which never are exhausted Of some images and sentiments the mind of man may be said to be enamoured, it meets them, however often they occur, with the same ardour which a lover feels at the sight of his mistress, and parts from them with the same regret when they can no longer be enjoyed

Of this kind are many descriptions which the poets have transcribed from each other, and their successours will probably copy to the end of time; which will continue to engage, or as the French term it, to flatter the imagination, as long as human nature shall remain the same

When a poet mentions the spring, we know that the zephyrs are about to whisper, that the groves are to recover their verdure, the linnets to warble forth their notes of love, and the flocks and herds to frisk over vales printed with flowers—yet, who is there so insensible of the beauties of nature, so little delighted with the renovation of the world, as not to feel his heart bound at the mention of the spring?

When night overshindows a romantick scene, all is stillness, silence, and quiet, the poets of the grove cease their melody, the moon towers over the world in gentle majesty, men forget their libours and their cares, and every passion and pursuit is for a while suspended. All this we know already, wet we hear it repeated without weariness, because such is generally the life of man, that he is pleased to think on the time when he shall pause from a sense of his condition.

When a poetical grove invites us to its covert, we know that we shall find what we have already seen a limpid brook murmuring over pebbles a bank diversified with flowers, a green arch that excludes the sun and a natural grot shaded with myrtles, yet who can forbear to enter the pleasing gloom, to enjoy coolness and privacy, and gratify himself once more by seenes with which nature has formed him to be delighted?

Many mor dentiments like ise are so adapted to our state, that we find approbation whenever they solicitit, and are seldom read without exciting a gentle emotion in the mind such is the comparison of the life of man with the duration of a flower, a thought which perhaps every nation has heard wiebled in its own language, from the inspired poets of the Hebreus to our own times yet this comparison must always please because every heart feels its justness, and every hour confirms it by example

Such, likewise, is the precept that directs us to use the present hour, and refer nothing to a distant time, which we are uncertain whether we shall reach: this every moralist may venture to inculcate, because it will always be approved, and because it is always

This rule is, indeed, every day enforced, by arguments more powerful than the dissertations of moralists: we see men pleasing themselves with future happiness, fixing a certain hour for the completion of their wishes, and perishing some at a greater and some at a less distance from the happy time; all complaining of their disappointments, and lamenting that they had suffered the years which Heaven allowed them, to pass without improvement, and deferred the principal purpose of their lives to the time when life itself was to forsake them

It is not only uncertain, whether, through all the casualties and dangers which beset the life of man, we shall be able to reach the time appointed for happiness or wisdom, but it is likely, that whatever now hinders us from doing that which our reason and conscience declare necessary to be done, will equally obstruct us in times to come. It is easy for the imagination, operating on things not yet existing, to please itself with scenes of unmingled felicity, or plan out courses of uniform virtue but good and evil are in real life inseparably united, habits grow stronger by indulgence, and reason loses her dignity, in proportion as she has oftener yielded to temptation " he that cannot live well to-day," says Martial, " will be less qualified to live well tomorrow"

Of the uncertanty of every human good every human being seems to be convinced, yet this uncertainty is voluntially increased by unnecessity delay, whether we respect eiteral cause or consider the nature of our own minds. He that now feels a desire to do right, and we has to recall the his life according to he rea on, is not sure that, at my future time a signable, he hall be able to rekindle the same ardour he that has no an opportunity offered him of breaking loose from vice and folly, cannot know, but that he shall hereafter be more entangled, and struggle for freedom without obtaining it

We are so unwilling to believe any thing to our own di advantage that we will always mayine the perspicacity of our judgment and the strangth of our resolution more likely to increase than to grow less by time and therefore conclude that the will to pursue laudable purpo es will be always seconded by the power

But however we may be deceived in calculating the strength of our faculties, we cannot doubt the uncertainty of that life in which they must be employed we see every day the unexpected death of our friends and our entinies we see new grives hourly opened for men older and vounger than our selves for the cuttous and the cutles, the dissolute and the temperate for men who like us were providing to enjoy or improve hours now irreverably cut off, we see all this, and yet, in tead of living, let year glide after year in preparations to live

in them that behold it, unless it be impressed upon the attention by uncommon circumstances every other man, have cutlived multitudes, have seen ambition sink in its triumphs, and beauty perish in its bloom, but have been seldom so much affected as by the fate of Euryalus, whom I lately lost as I began to love hun

Euryalus had for some time flourished in a luciative profession, but having suffered his imagination to be fired by an unextinguishable curiosity, he grew weary of the same dull round of life, resolved to harass himself no longer with the dindgery of getting money, but to quit his business and his profit, and enjoy for a few years the pleasures of travel friends heard him proclaim his resolution without suspecting that he intended to pursue it but he was constant to his purpose, and with great expedition closed his accounts and sold his moveables, passed a few days in bidding farewell to his companions, and with all the eagerness of romantick chivalry crossed the sea in search of happiness Whatever place was renowned in ancient or modern history, whatever region art or nature had distinguished, he determined to visit: full of design and hope he landed on the continent, his friends expected accounts from him of the new scenes that opened in his progress, but were informed in a few days that Euryalus was dead.

Such was the end of Euryalus He is entered that state, whence none ever shall return, and can now only benefit his friends, by remaining in their memories a permanent and efficacious instance of the blindnesss of desire, and the uncertainty of all terrestrial terrestrial good But, perhaps, every man has like me lost an Linya'us has known a friend die with happiness in his grasp, and yet every man continues to think himself secure of life, and defers to some future time of leisure what he knows it will be fatal to have finilly omitted

It is indeed, with this as with other fruities inherent in our nature, the desire of deferring to another time, what cannot be done without endurance of some pain, or forbearance of some pleasure will perhaps, never be totally overcome or suppressed, there will always be something that we shall wish to have finished and be nevertheless unwilling to begin but against this unwillingnes it is our duty to struggle, and every conquest over our passions will make way for an easier conquest custom is equally forcible to bad ind good anture will always be at arrance with reason, but will rebel more feebly as she is oftener subdued

The common neglect of the present hour is more shuneful and criminal as no man is betrayed to it by errour, but admits it by negligence. Of the in tability of life, the weakest understanding never thinks wrong though the strongest often omits to think justly reason and experience are always ready to inform us of our real state, but we refuse to listen to then suggestions because we feel our hearts un willing to obey them but, surely, nothing is more unworthy of a re isonable being, than to shut his eyes when he sees the road which he is commanded to travel that he may deviate with fewer reproaches from himself, nor could any motive to tenderness except the consciousness that we have all been guilty of the same fault, dispose us to pity those who thus consign themselves to voluntary ruin

Nume III. Tuesday, November 27, 1753

Quæ non fecimus ipsi Vix ca nosti a voco

DRYDEN.

THE evils inseparably annexed to the present condition of man, are so numerous and afflictive, that it has been, from age to age, the task of some to beward, and of others to solace them, and he, therefore, will be in danger of seeing a common enemy, who shall attempt to depreciate the few pleasures and felicities which nature has allowed us

Yet I will confess, that I have sometimes employed my thoughts in examining the pretensions that are made to happiness, by the splendid and envied condition of life, and have not thought the hour unprofitably spent, when I have detected the imposture of counterfeit advantages, and found disquiet lunking under false appearances of gayety and greatness.

It is asserted by a tragick poet, that "est miser nemo nisi comparatus," "no man is miserable, but

"but as he is compared with others happier than himself this position is not strictly and philo sophically true. He might have sud, with rigorous propriety that no man is happy but as he is compared with the miserable, for such is the state of this world that we find in it absolute misery, but happiness only comparative weimy incur as much pain as we can possibly endure, though we can never obtain as much happiness as we might possibly enjoy.

Yet it is certain likewise, that many of our miseries are merely comparative a care often made unhappy, not by the presence of any real evil, but by the absence of some fictitious good, of something which is not required by any real want of nature, which has not in itself any power of gratification, and which neither reason nor fancy would have prompted us to wish, did we not see it in the possession of others

For a mind diseased with vain longings after un attainable advantages no medicine can be prescribed, but an impartial inquiry into the real worth of that which is so ardently desired. It is well known, how much the mind, as well is the eye, is deceived by distance, and, perhaps, it will be found, that of many imagined blessings it may be doubted whether he that wants or possesses them has more ie ison to be satisfied with his lot.

The dignity of high birth and long extraction, no man, to whom nature has denied it, can confer upon himself and therefore, it deserves to be considered, whether the want of that which can never be gained, may not easily be endured. It is true that if we consider the triumph and delight with which most of those recount their ancestors who have ancestors to recount, and the artifices by which some who have risen to unexpected fortune endeavour to inseit themselves into an honourable stem, we shall be inclined to fancy that wisdom or viitue may be had by inheritance, or that all the excellencies of a line of piogenitors are accumulated on their descendant Reason, indeed, will soon inform us, that our estimation of birth is arbitrary and capricious, and that dead ancestors can have no influence but upon imagination. let it then be examined, whether one dream may not operate in the place of another, whether he that owes nothing to forefathers, may not receive equal pleasure from the consciousness of owing all to himself, whether he may not, with a little meditation, find it more honourable to found than to continue a family, and to gain dignity than transmit it, whether, if he receives no dignity from the virtues of his family, he does not likewise escape the danger of being disgraced by their crimes, and whether he that brings a new name into the world, has not the convenience of playing the game of life without a stake, and opportunity of winning much though he has nothing to lose

There is another opinion concerning happiness, which approaches much more nearly to universality, but which may, perhaps, with equal reason be disputed. The pretensions to ancestral honours many of the sons of earth easily see to be ill-grounded; but all agree to celebrate the advantage of hereditary riches, and to consider those as the minions of fortune, who are wealthy from their cradles, whose estate is "resion parta labore sed relicta," "the acqui-

"sition of another, not of themselves," and whom a father's industry has dispensed from a laborious attention to arts or commerce and left at liberty to dispose of life as fancy shall direct them

If every man were we and virtuous, capable to discern the best use of time and resolute to practise it, it might be granted I think, without hesitation, that total liberty would be a blessing, and that it would be desirable to be left at large to the exercise of religious and social duties, without the interruption of importunate avocations

but since felicity is relative, and that which is the means of happiness to one man may be to another the cause of misery, we are to consider, what state is best adapted to human nature in its present degeneracy and fruity. And suicly to far the greater number it is highly expedient, that they should by some settled scheme of duties be rescued from the tyranny of caprice, that they should be driven on by necessity through the paths of life with their attention confined to a stated task that they may be less at lessure to deviate into mischief at the call of folly

When we observe the lives of those whom an ample inheritance has let loose to their own direction what do we discover that can excite our enty? Their time seems not to pass with much applicuse from others or satisfaction to themselves many squander their exuberance of fortune in luxury and debauchery, and have no other use of money than to influme their passions and not in a wide range of licentiousness others less criminal indeed, but surely, not much to be praised he down to sleep and rise up to trifle, are employed every morning in finding expedients to 11d themselves of the day, chase pleasure through all the places of publick resort, fly from London to Bath, and from Bath to London, without any other reason for changing place, but that they go in quest of company as idle and as vagrant as themselves, always endeavouring to raise some new desire that they may have something to pursue, to rekindle some hope which they know will be disappointed, changing one amusement for another which a few months will make equally insipid, or sinking into languor and disease for want of something to actuate their bodies or exhibitate their minds

Whoever has frequented those places, where idlers assemble to escape from solitude, knows that this is generally the state of the wealthy, and from this state it is no great hardship to be debarred. No man can be happy in total idleness, he that should be condemned to he torpid and motionless, "would fly for recreation," says South, "to the mines and the galleys," and it is well, when nature or fortune find employment for those, who would not have known how to procure it for themselves

He, whose mind is engaged by the acquisition or improvement of a fortune, not only escapes the insipidity of indifference, and the tediousness of mactivity, but gains enjoyments wholly unknown to those, who live lazily on the toil of others, for life affords no higher pleasure than that of surmounting difficulties, passing from one step of success to another, forming nevy wishes, and seeing them gratified. He that labours

in any great or landable undertaking, has his futigues first supported by hope and afterwards rewarded by joy he is always moving to a certain end, and when he has attained it an end more distant invites him to a new puisuit

It does not indeed, always happen, that diligence is fortunate the wisest schemes are broken by unexpected accidents, the most constant perseverance sometimes toils through life without a recompene but labour though unsuccessful is more eligible than idleness he that prosecutes a lawful purpose by lawful means, acts always with the approbation of his own reason he is amounted through the course of his endeavours by an expectation which though not certain, he knows to be just, and is a list conforted in his diappointment by the consciousness that he bas not fulled by his own fullt

That kind of life is most happy which affords tis most opportunities of gruing our own esteem, and what can any mainful in his own fivour from a condition to which however prosperous he contributed nothing and which the vilest and weakest of the species would have obtained by the same right, had he happened to be the son of the same father

To strive with difficulties and to conquer them is the highest human felicity—the next is to strive—ind deserve to conquer—but he whose life—his passed without a contest—ind who can boost neither success from ment—can survey him elf only as a uscless filler of existence, and if he is content with his own character must owe his satisfiction to insensibility.

Thus it appears that the saturate advised rightly, when he directed us to resign ourselves to the hands

What state of life admits most happiness, is uncertain, but that uncertainty ought to repress the petulance of comparison, and silence the murmuis of discontent

All dare to write, who can or cannot read

They who have attentively considered the history of mankind, know that every age has its peculiar character. At one time, no desire is felt but for military honours, every summer affords battles and sieges, and the world is filled with ravage, bloodshed, and devastation—this sangumary fury at length subsides, and nations are divided into factions, by controversies about points that will never be decided. Men then grow weary of debate and aftercation, and apply themselves themselves to the arts of profit, trading companies are formed, manufactures improved, and maighting extended and nothing is any longer thought on, but the increase and preservation of property, the artifices of getting money, and the pleasures of spending it

The present age, if we consider chiefly the state of our own country, may be styled with great pro priety The age of Authors, for, perhaps, there never was a time in which men of all degrees of ability, of every kind of education, of every profession and employment, were posting with ardour so general to the press. The province of writing was formerly left to those, who by study, or appearance of study, were supposed to have guined knowledge unattain able by the busy part of mankind, but in these enlightened days, every man is qualified to instruct every other man, and he that beats the anul, or guides the plough, not content with supplying corporal necessities amuses himself in the hours of leisure with providing intellectual pleasures for his country men

It may be observed, that of this, as of other evils, complaints have been made by every generation—but though it may, perhaps, be true, that at all times more have been willing than have been able to write, yet there is no reason for believing that the dogmatical legions of the present race were ever equalled in number by any former period, for so widely is spread the itch of literary praise—that almost every main is an author, either in act or in purpose, has either be stowed his favours on the publick or withholds them, that they may be more ensorably offered, or made more worthy of acceptance

In former times, the pen, like the sword, was considered as consigned by nature to the hands of men; the ladies contented themselves with private virtues and domestick excellence, and a female writer, like a female warriour, was considered as a kind of eccentric being, that deviated, however illustriously, from her due sphere of motion, and was, therefore, rather to be gazed at with wonder, than countenanced But as the times past are said to by imitation have been a nation of Amazons, who diew the bow and wielded the battle-axe, formed encampments and wasted nations, the revolution of years has now produced a generation of Amazons of the pen, who with the spirit of their predecessors have set masculine tyranny at defiance, asserted their claim to the regions of science, and seem resolved to contest the usurpations of virility

Some, indeed, there are of both sexes, who are authors only in desire, but have not yet attained the power of executing their intentions, whose performances have not arrived at bulk sufficient to form a volume, or who have not the confidence, however impatient of nameless obscurity, to solicit openly the assistance of the printer. Among these are the innumerable correspondents of publick papers, who are always offering assistance which no man will receive, and suggesting hints that are never taken, and who complain loudly of the perverseness and arrogance of authors, lament their insensibility of their own interest, and fill the coffee-houses with dark stories of performances by eminent hands, which have been offered and rejected

To what cause this universal eagerness of writing can be properly ascribed, I have not yet been able to discover It is said that every ait is propagated in proportion to the rewards conferred upon it, a position from which a stranger would naturally infer, that literature was now bles ed with patronage far transcending the candour or munificence of the Augustine age that the road to greatness was open to none but authors and that by writing alone riches and honour were to be obtained

But since it is true, that writers lile other competitors, are very little disposed to f wour one another it is not to be e pected that at a time when every man writes any man will patronize, and accord angly there is not one that I can recollect at present who professes the least regard for the votages of science invites the addresses of learned men, or seems to hope for reputation from any pen but his own

The cause therefore of this epidemical conspiracy for the destruction of paper, must remain a secret nor can I discover whether we owe it to the influences of the constellations, or the intemperature of seasons whether the long continuance of the wind at any single point, or intoxicating vapours exhiled from the eath, have turned our nobles and our persants, our soldiers and traders, our men and women all into wits, philo ophers, and writers

It is, indeed, of more importance to search out the cure than the cause of this intellectual malady and he would deserve well of this country, who, instead of amusing himself with conjectural specula tions should find means of persuading the neer to inspect his steward a accounts of repair the rural mansion of his ancestors, who could replace the

General irregularities are known in time to remedy themselves. By the constitution of ancient Ægupt, the priesthood was continually increasing, till at length there was no people beside themselves: the establishment was then dissolved, and the number of priests was reduced and limited. Thus among us, writers will, perhaps, be multiplied, till no readers will be found, and then the ambition of writing must necessarily cease.

But as it will be long before the cure is thus gradually effected, and the cvil should be stopped, if it be possible, before it rises to so great a height, I could wish that both sexes would fix their thoughts upon some salutary considerations, which might repress their ardom for that reputation which not one of many thousands is fated to obtain

Let it be deeply impressed and frequently recollected, that he who has not obtained the proper qualifications of an author, can have no escuse for the arrogance of writing, but the power of imparting to mankind something necessary to be known. A man uneducated or unlettered may sometimes start a useful thought, or make a lucky discovery, or obtain by chance some secret of nature, or some intelligence of facts, of which the most enlightened mind may be ignorant, and which it is better to reveal, though by a rude and unskilful communication, than to lose for ever by suppressing it

But few will be justified by this plea, for of the innumerable books and pamphlets that have over-flowed the nation, scarce one has made any addition to real knowledge, or contained more than a transposition of common sentiments and a repetition of common phrases

It will be naturally inquired when the man who feels in inclination to write, may venture to suppose himself properly qualified and, since every man is inclined to think well of his own intellect by what test he may try his abilities, without hazarding the contempt or resentment of the publick

The first qualification of a writer is a perfect knowledge of the subject which he undertakes to treat, since we cannot teach what we do not know, nor can properly undertake to instruction. The next requisite is, that he be master of the language in which he delivers his sentiments, if he treats of science and demonstration that he has attained a style clear, pure, nervous and expressive if his topicks be probable and persuasory, that he be able to recommend them by the superaddition of elegrance and imagery, to display the colours of varied diction, and pour forth the musick of modulated periods

If it be again inquired upon what principles any man shall conclude that he wants these powers it may be readily answered, that no end is attrined but by the proper means, he only can rationally presume that he understands a subject who has read and compared the writers that have intherited discussed it, familiarized their arguments to himself by long meditation, consulted the foundations of different systems, and separated truth from errour by a rigorous examination

In like manner, he only has a right to suppose that he can express his thoughts, whatever they are, with perspiculty or elegance, who has carefully perused the best authors, accurately noted their diversities of style, diligently selected the best modes of diction, and families and them by long liabits of attentive practice

No man is a thetoreción or philosopher by chance He who knows that he undertakes to write on questions which he has never studied, may without hesitation determine, that he is about to waste his own time and that of his reader, and expose himself to the decision of those whom he aspires to instruct. he that without forming his style by the study of the best models, hastens to obtude his compositions on the publick, may be certain, that whatever hope or flattery may suggest, he shall shock the learned ear with barbarisms, and contribute, wherever his work shall be received, to the depraration of taste and the corruption of language

WHEN Socrates was asked "which of mortal men "was to be accounted nearest to the gods in hap "piness", he answered, "that man, who is in "want of the fewest things

In this answer Socrates left it to be guessed by his auditors, whether by the exemption from want which was to constitute happiness he meant amplitude of possessions or contraction of desire And, indeed, there is so little difference between them, that Alexander the Great confessed the inhabitant of a tub the next man to the master of the world, and left a declaration to future ages that if he was not Alexander he should wish to be Diogenes

These two states however, though they resemble each other in their consequence, differ widely with respect to the facility with which they may be attained. To make great acquisitions can happen to very few, and in the uncertainty of human affairs, to many it will be incident to labour without reward, and to lose what they already possess by endeavours to make it more: some will always want abilities, and others opportunities to accumulate wealth. It is therefore happy, that nature has allowed us a more certain and easy road to plenty, every man may grow rich by contracting his wishes, and by quiet acquiescence in what has been given him supply the absence of more

Yet so far is almost every man from emulating the happiness of the gods, by any other means than grasping at their power, that it seems to be the great business of life to create wants as fast they are satisfied It has been long observed by moralists, that every man squanders or loses a great part of that life, of which every man knows and deplores the shortness: and it may be remarked with equal justness, that though every man laments his own insufficiency to his happiness, and knows himself a necessitous and piecanous being, incessantly soliciting the assistance of others, and feeling wants which his own art or strength cannot supply, yet there is no man, who does not, by the superaddition of unnatural cares, render himself still more dependent, who does not create an artificial poverty, and suffer himself to feel pain for the want of that, of which, when it is gained, he can have no enjoyment

It must, indeed, be allowed, that as we lose part of our time because it steals away silent and invisible, and many an hour is passed before we recollect that it is passing, so unnatural desires insinuate themselves unobserved into the mind, and we do not perceive that they are gaining upon us, till the pain which they give us awakens us to notice. No man is sufficiently vigilant to take account of every minute of his life, or to writch every motion of his heart Much of our time likewise is sacrificed to custom, we trifle, because we see others trifle in the same manner ve catch from example the contagion of desire, we see all about us busied in pursuit of imaginary good and begin to bustle in the same chase lest greater activity should triumph over us

It is true that to man as a member of society, many things become necessity, which, perhaps in a state of nature are superfluous, and that many things, not absolutely necessary, are yet so useful and convenient, that they cannot easily be spared. I will make yet a more ample and liberal concession. In opulent states and regular governments, the temptations to wealth and rank, and to the distinctions that follow them are such as no force of understanding finds it easy to resist.

If, therefore, I saw the quiet of life disturbed only by endeavours after wealth and honour, by solicitude which the world whether justly or not considered as important, I should scarcely have had courage to inculcate any precepts of moderation and forbearance. He that is engaged in a pursuit in which all mankind profess to be his rivals as supported by the authority of all mankind in the prosecution of his design and will therefore, scarcely stop to hear the lectures of a solitary philosopher. Nor am I certain, that the accumulation of honest gain ought to be hindered or the ambition of just honours always to confer any benefit upon others may be desired upon virtuous principles, and we ought not too rashly to accuse any man of intending to confine the influence of his acquisitions to himself

But if we look round upon mankind, whom shall we find among those that fortune permits to form their own manners, that is not tormenting himself with a wish for something, of which all the pleasure and all the benefit will cease at the moment of attainment? One man is beggaring his posterity to build a house, which when finished he never will inhabit; another is levelling mountains to open a prospect, which, when he has once enjoyed it, he can enjoy no more, another is painting ceilings, carving wainscot, and filling his apartments with costly furniture, only that some neighbouring house may not be richer or finer than his own

That splendour and elegance are not desirable, I am not so abstracted from life as to inculcate, but if we inquire closely into the reason for which they are esteemed, we shall find them valued principally as evidences of wealth. Nothing, therefore, can show greater depravity of understanding, than to delight in the show when the reality is wanting, or voluntarily to become poor, that strangers may for a time imagine us to be rich.

But there are yet minuter objects and more trifling anxieties. Men may be found, who are kept from sleep by the want of a shell particularly variegated! who are wasting then lives, in stratagems to obtain a book in a language which they do not understand, who pine with envy at the flowers of another man's parterre, who hover like vultures round the owner of a fossil, in hopes to plunder his cabinet at his death, and who would not much regret to see a

He that imagines me to speak of these sages in terms exaggerated and hyperbolical, has conversed but little with the race of virtuosos. A slight acquaint ance with their studies and a few visits to their assemblies, would inform him, that nothing is sow orthless, but that prejudice and caprice can give it value, nor any thing of so little use, but that by indulging an idle competition or unreasonable pride, a man may make it to himself one of the necessaries of life.

Derires like these, I may surely, without incurring the censure of moroseness, advise every man to repel when they invade his mind, or if he admits them, never to allow them any greater influence, than is no cessary to give petty employments the power of pleas ing and diversify the day with slight amusements

An irdent wish whatever be its object, will always be able to interrupt tranquillity. What we believe ourselves to want, torments us not in proportion to its real value, but according to the estimation by which we have rated it in our own minds, in some diseases the patient has been observed to long for food, which scarce any extremity of hunger would in health have compelled him to swallow but while his organs were thus deprayed, the craying was irresistible, nor could any rest be obtained till it was appeased by compliance Of the same nature are the irregular appetites of the mind, though they are often excited by trifles, they are equally disquiet ing with real wants the Roman, who went at the death of his lamprey, felt the same degree of sorrow that extorts tears on other occasions

Inordinate desires, of whatever kind, ought to be repressed upon yet a higher consideration, they must be considered as enemies not only to happiness but There are men, among those commonly reckoned the learned and the wise, who spare no stratagems to remove a competitor at an auction, who will sink the price of a rainty at the expense of truth, and whom it is not safe to trust alone in a library or cabinet. These are faults, which the frateinity seem to look upon as jocular mischiefs, or to think excused by the violence of the temptation. but I shall always fear that he, who accustoms himself to fraud in little things, wants only opportunity to practise it in greater, "he that has hardened him-"self by killing a sheep," says Pythagoras, "will with less reluctance shed the blood of a man"

To prize every thing according to its real use ought to be the aim of a rational being. There are few things which can much conduce to happiness, and, therefore, few things to be aidently desired. He that looks upon the business and bustle of the world, with the philosophy with which Sociates surveyed the fair at Athens, will turn away at last with his exclamation, "How many things are here which "I do not want!"

But no frail man however areat or high Can be concluded blest before he die

Apprens

THE numerous miseries of human life have extorted in all ages an universal complaint. The wisest of men terminated all his experiments in search of happiness by the mournful confession, that "all is ' vanity, and the ancient patierchs lamented, that " the days of their pilgrimage were few and " eul

There is, indeed, no topick on which it is more superfluous to accumulate authorities, nor any assertion of which our own eyes will more easily discover. or our sensitions more frequently impress the truth, than, that misery is the lot of man, that our present state is a state of danger and infelicity

When we take the most distant prospect of life. what does it present us but a chaos of unhappiness, a confused and tumultuous scene of labour and contest. disappointment and defeat? If we view past ages in the reflection of history what do they offer to our meditation but crimes and calamities? One year is distinguished by a famine another by an eurthquake Lingdoms are made desolate sometimes by wars and sometimes by pestilence the peace of the world is interrupted S 4 interrupted at one time by the caprices of a tyrant, at another by the rage of a conqueror. The memory is stored only with vicissitudes of evil, and the happiness, such as it is, of one part of mankind, is found to arise commonly from sangunary success, from victories which confer upon them the power, not so much of improving life by any new enjoyment, as of inflicting misery on others, and gratifying their own pride by comparative greatness

But by him that examines life with a more close attention, the happiness of the world will be found still less than it appears. In some intervals of publick prosperity, or to use terms more proper, in some intermissions of calamity, a general diffusion of happiness may seem to overspread a people, all is triumph and exultation, jollity and plenty; there are no publick fears and dangers, and "no complainings in the streets." But the condition of individuals is very little mended by this general calm pain and malice and discontent still continue their havock, the silent depredation goes incessantly forward, and the grave continues to be filled by the victims of sorrow

He that enters a gay assembly, beholds the cheer-fulness displayed in every countenance, and finds all sitting vacant and disengaged, with no other attention than to give or to receive pleasure, would naturally imagine, that he had reached at last the metropolis of felicity, the place sacred to gladness of heart, from whence all fear and anxiety were neversibly excluded. Such, indeed, we may often find to be the opinion of those, who from a lower station look up to the pomp and gayety which they cannot reach: but who is there of those who frequent these luxurious assemblies, that will not confess his own uneasiness, or cannot recount the vexations and distresses that prey upon the lives of his gay companions?

The world, in its best state is nothing more than a larger assembly of beings, combining to counterfeit happiness which they do not feel, employing every ait and contrivance to embellish life, and to hide their real condition from the eyes of one another

The species of happiness most obvious to the observation of others, is that which depends upon the goods of foitune—yet even this is often fictitious. There is in the world more poverty than is generally imagined, not only because many whose possessions are large have desires still larger and many measure their wants by the gratifications which others enjoy but great numbers are pressed by real necessities which it is their chief ambition to conceal, and are forced to purchase the appearance of competence and cheerfulness at the expense of many comforts and conveniencies of life

Many, however, are confessedly rich and many more are sufficiently removed from all danger of real poverty but it has been long ago remarked, that money cannot purchase quiet the highest of mankind can promise themselves no exemption from that discord or suspicion by which the sweetness of do mestick retirement is destroyed and must always be even more exposed in the same degree as they are clevated above others, to the treachery of dependents, the calumny of defamers and the violence of opponents

Affliction is inseparable from our present state; it adheres to all the inhabitants of this world, in different proportions indeed, but with an allotment which seems very little regulated by our own conduct. It has been the boast of some swelling moralists, that every man's fortune was in his own power, that prudence supplied the place of all other divinities, and that happiness is the unfailing consequence of virtue. But, surely, the quiver of Omnipotence is stored with arrows, against which the shield of human virtue, however adamantine it has been boasted, is held up in vain, we do not always suffer by our crimes; we are not always protected by our innocence.

A good man is by no means exempt from the danger of suffering by the crimes of others, even his goodness may raise him enemies of implacable malice and restless perseverance, the good man has never been warranted by Heaven from the treachery of friends, the disobedience of children, or the dishonesty of a wife, he may see his cares made useless by profusion, his instructions defeated by perverseness, and his kindness rejected by ingratitude, he may languish under the infamy of false accusations, or perish reproachfully by an unjust sentence

A good man is subject, like other mortals, to all the influences of natural evil, his harvest is not spared by the tempest, nor his cattle by the murrain, his house flames like others in a conflagration, nor have his ships any peculiar power of resisting hurricanes; his mind, however elevated, inhabits a body subject to innumerable casualties, of which he must always share the dangers and the pains, he bears about him

the seeds of disease, and may linger away a great part of his life under the tortures of the gout or stone, at one time grouning with insufferable inguish, at another dissolved in listlessness and languor

I rom this general and indiscr minate distribution of misery the moralists have always derived one of their strongest moral arguments for a future state, for since the common events of the present life happen alike to the good and bad, it follows from the justice of the Supreme Being that there must be an other state of existence in which a just retribution shall be made, and every man shall be happy and miserable according to his works.

The miseries of life may perhaps, afford some proof of a future state compared as well with the mercy as the justice of God. It is searcely to be imagined that Infinite Benevolence would create a being expuble of enjoying so much more than is here to be enjoyed and qualified by nature to prolong pain by remembrance and anticipate it by terrour, if he was not deagned for something nobler and better than a state in which many of his figulties can serve only for his torment, in which he is to be im portuned by desires that never our be satisfied, to feel many evils which he lind no power to avoid and to fear many which he shall never feel there will surely come a time, when every capacity of happiness shall be filled, and none shall be wretched but by his own fault

In the mean time it is by affliction chiefly that the heart of man is purified and that the thoughts are fixed upon a better state. Prosperity diagonal imperfect as it is, has power to intoxicate the imagination, to fix the mind upon the present scene, to produce confidence and elation, and to make him who enjoys affluence and honours forget the hand by which they were bestowed. It is seldom that we are otherwise, than by affliction, awakened to a sense of our own imbeculity, or taught to know how little all our acquisitions can conduce to safety or to quiet, and how justly we may ascribe to the superintendence of a higher Power, those blessings which in the wantonness of success we considered as the attainments of our policy or courage

Nothing confers so much ability to resist the temptations that perpetually surround us, as an habitual consideration of the shortness of life, and the uncertainty of those pleasures that solicit our pursuit; and this consideration can be inculcated only by affliction "O Death! how bitter is the remembrance of thee, to a man that lives at ease in his possessions!" If our present state were one continued succession of delights, or one uniform flow of calmness and tranquillity, we should never willingly think upon its end, death would then surely surprise us as "a thief in the night," and our task of duty would remain unfinished, till "the night," came when no man can work."

While affliction thus prepares us for felicity, we may console ourselve's under its pressures, by remembering, that they are no particular marks of divine displeasure, since all the distresses of persecution have been suffered by those, "of whom the world "was not worthy," and the Redeemer of Mankind himself was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with "grief."

THERE has always prevailed among that part of man kind that addict their minds to speculation a propensity to talk much of the delights of retirement, and some of the most pleasing compositions produced in every age contain descriptions of the peace and happiness of a country life

I know not whether those who thus ambitious's repeat the praises of solitude, have always considered, how much they depreciate manland by declaring, that whatever is excellent or desirable is to be obtained by departing from them, that the assistance which we may derive from one another, is not equivalent to the evils which we have to fear, that the kindness of a few is overbalanced by the malice of many, and that the protection of society is too dearly purchased by encountering its dangers and enduring its oppressions

These specious representations of solitary happiness however opprobrious to human nature, have so far spread their influence over the world, that almost every man delights his imagination with the hopes of obtaining some time an opportunity of retreat. Many, indeed, who enjoy retreat only in imagination, content themselves with believing, that another year will transport them to rural tranquillity, and die while they talk of doing what, if they had lived longer, they would never have done But many likewise there are, either of greater resolution or more credulity, who in earnest try the state which they have been taught to think thus secure from cares and dangers, and retire to privacy, either that they may improve their happiness, increase their knowledge, or exalt their virtue

The greater part of the admirers of solitude, as of all other classes of mankind, have no higher or remoter view, than the present gratification of their Of these, some, haughty and impetuous, fly from society only because they cannot bear to repay to others the regard which themselves exact; and think no state of life eligible, but that which places them out of the reach of censure or controul, and affords them opportunities of living in a perpetual compliance with their own inclinations, without the necessity of regulating their actions by any other man's convenience of opinion

There are others, of minds more delicate and tender, easily offended by every deviation from rectitude, soon disgusted by ignorance or impertinence, and always expecting from the conversation of mankind more elegance, purity, and truth, than the mingled mass of life will easily afford Such men are in haste to retire from grossness, falsehood, and biutality, and hope to find in private habitations at least a negative felicity, an exemption from the shocks

shocks and perturbations vith which public scenes are continually distressing them

To neither of these votaries will obtude afford that content, which she has been taught so lawship to promise. The man of arrogance will quie! It discover that by esciping from his opponents he has lost his flutterers, that greatness is nothing a licie it is not seen, and power nothing where it cannot be felt, and he, whose ficulties are employed in too close an observation of fullings, and defects will find his condition very little mended by transferring his attention from others to himself, he will probably soon come back in quest of new objects, and be glad to keep his captiousness employed on any character rather than his own

Others are seduced into solitude mercly by the authority of great names, and expect to find the e charms in tranquility which have allured statesmen and conquerors to the slindes these likewise are upt to wonder at their disappointment for want of con sidering that those whom they aspire to imit ite carried with them to their country sents minds full fraught with subjects of reflection, the consciousness of great meri the memory of illustrious actions, the knowledge of important events, and the seeds of mighty designs to be ripened by future meditation, Solitude was to such men a release from fatigue, and an oppo tunity of usefulness But what can active ment confer upon him who having done nothing can receive no support from his own importance, who having known nothing can find no entertainment in reviewing the past, and who intending nothing can form no hopes from prospects of the future?

He can, surely, take no wiser course than that of losing himself again in the crowd, and filling the vacuities of his mind with the news of the day

Others consider solitude as the parent of philosophy, and retire in expectation of greater intimacies with science, as Numa repaired to the groves when he conferred with Egeria. These men have not always reason to repent. Some studies require a continued prosecution of the same train of thought, such as is too often interrupted by the petty avocations of common life, sometimes, likewise, it is necessary, that a multiplicity of objects be at once present to the mind, and every thing, therefore, must be kept at a distance, which may perplex the memory, or dissipate the attention

But though learning may be confeired by solitude, its application must be attained by general converse. He has learned to no purpose, that is not able to teach, and he will always teach unsuccessfully, who cannot recommend his sentiments by his diction or address

Even the acquisition of knowledge is often much facilitated by the advantages of society: he that never compares his notions with those of others, readily acquiesces in his first thoughts, and very seldom discovers the objections which may be raised against his opinions; he, therefore, often thinks himself in possession of truth, when he is only fondling an errour long since exploded. He that has neither companions nor rivals in his studies, will always applaud his own progress, and think highly of his performances, because he knows not that others have equalled or excelled him. And I am afraid it may be added, that the student who withdraws himself from the world will soon feel that ardour extinguished which praise or emulation had enkindled and take the advantage of secrecy to sleep, rather than to labour

There remains yet another set of recluses whose intention entitles them to higher respect, and whose motives deserve a more serious consideration. The cretire from the world not merely to bask in ease or gratify curiosity, but that being disengaged from common cares, they may employ more time in the duties of religion, that they may regulate their actions with stricter vigilance, and purify their thoughts by more frequent meditation.

To men thus elevated above the mists of mortality, I am fur from presuming myself qualified to give directions On him that appears to pass through "things temporary, with no other care than " to lose finally the tlungs eternal, I look with such veneration as inclines me to approve his conduct in the whole, without a minute examination of it, parts. vet I could never forbear to wish, that while vice is every day multiplying seducements, and stalking forth with more hardened effrontery virtue would not withdraw the influence of her presence, or for bear to assert her natural dignity by open and undaunted perseverance in the right Piety practised in solitude, like the flower that blooms in the desert, may give its fragrance to the winds of Heaven and delight those unbodied spirits that survey the works of God and the actions of men but it bestows no assistance upon earthly beings, and however free Vot. III from

Our Maker, who, though he gave us such varieties of temper and such difference of powers, yet designed us all for happiness, undoubtedly intended, that we should obtain that happiness by different means Some are unable to resist the temptations of importunity, or the impetuosity of their own passions incited by the force of present temptations. of these it is undoubtedly the duty to 'fly from enemies which they cannot conquer, and to cultivate, in the calm of solitude, that virtue which is too tender to endure the tempests of publick life But there are others, whose passions grow more strong and irregular in privacy, and who cannot maintain an uniform tenous of virtue, but by exposing their manners to the publick eye, and assisting the admonitions of conscience with the fear of infamy · for such it is dangerous to exclude all witnesses of their conduct, till they have formed strong habits of viitue, and weakened their passions by frequent victories But there is a higher order of men so inspired with ardour, and so fortified with resolution, that the world passes before them without influence or regard: these ought to consider themselves as appointed the guardians of mankind. they are placed in an evil world, to exhibit publick examples of good life: and may be said, when they withdraw to solitude, to desert the station which Providence assigned them.

It is common among all the classes of mankind, to charge each other with trafling away life every man looks on the occupation or amusement of his neighbour, as something below the dignity of our nature, and unworthy of the attention of a rational being

A man who considers the plucity of the wants of nature, and who being acquinited with the various means by which all manual occupations are now facilitated, observes what numbers are supported by the labour of a few, would, indeed, he inclined to wonder, how the multitudes who are exempted from the necessity of working either for themselves or others, find business to fill up the vacanties of life. The greater part of mankind neither card the fleece dig the mine, fell the wood nor gather in the harvest, they neither tend herds nor build houses, in what then are they employed?

This is cert unly a question, which a distant prospect of the world will not enable us to answer. We find all ranks and ages mingled together in a tumul tuous confusion, with laste in their motions, and eagerness in their looks, but what they have to pursue or avoid, a more minute observation must inform them

When we analyse the crowd into individuals, it soon appears that the passions and imaginations of men will not easily suffer them to be idle we see things coveted merely because they are rare, and pursued because they are fugitive, we see men conspire to fix an arbitrary value on that which is worthless in itself, and then contend for the possession One is a collector of fossils, of which he knows no other use than to show them, and when he has stocked his own repository, gneves that the stones which he has left behind him should be picked up by another The florist nurses a tulip, and repines that his rival's beds enjoy the same showers and sunshine with his own. This man is hurrying to a concert, only lest others should have heard the new musician before him, another buists from his company to the play, because he fancies himself the pation of an actiess, some spend the morning in consultations with their tailor, and some in directions to their cook some are forming parties for cards, and some laying wagers at a horse-race

It cannot, I think, be denied, that some of these lives are passed in trifles, in occupations by which the busy neither benefit themselves nor others, and by which no man could be long engaged, who senously considered what he was doing, or had knowledge enough to compare what he is with what he might be made. However, as people who have the same inclination generally flock together, every trifler is kept in countenance by the sight of others as unprofitably profitably active as himself, by kindling the heat of competition he in time thinks himself important, and by having his mind intensely engaged, he is secured from weariness of himself

Some degree of self approbation is always the reward of diligence—and I cannot therefore but consider the laborious cultivation of petty ple isures as a more happy and more virtuous disposition, than that universal contempt and haughty negligence—which is sometimes associated with powerful faculties, but is often assumed by indolence when it disowns itsname, and aspires to the appellation of greatness of mind

It has been long observed, that diollery and ridicule is the most easy kind of wit let it be added, that contempt and arrogance is the easiest philosophy. To find some objection to everything, and to dissolve in perpetual laziness under pretence that occasions are wanting to call forth activity to laugh at those who are ridiculously busy without setting an example of more a tronal industry, is no less in the power of the meanest than of the highest intellects.

Our present state has placed us at once in such different relations, that every human employment, which is not a visible and immediate act of goodness will be in some respect or other subject to contempt, but it is true likewise that almost every act which is not directly vicious is in some respect beneficial and laudable. I often 'says Bruyere," observe "from my window two beings of creet form and "ammable countenance endowed with the powers of "reason able to clothe their thoughts in language, and convey their notions to each other. They are "early in the morning and are every day employed."

" till sunset in rubbing two smooth stones together,

" or, in other terms, in polishing marble"

" If hons could paint," says the fable, " in the " 100m of those pictures which exhibit men van-

" quishing lions, we should see lions feeding upon

If the stonecutter could have written like " men " Bruyere, what would he have replied? "I look up," says he, "every day from my shop, " upon a man whom the idlers, who stand still to " gaze upon my work, often celebrate as a wit and a " philosopher. I often perceive his face clouded with " care, and am told that his taper is sometimes "burning at midnight The sight of a man who " works so much harder than myself, excited my " curiosity. I heard no sound of tools in his apart-" ment, and, therefore, could not imagine what he " was doing; but was told at last, that he was " writing descriptions of mankind, who when he had " described them would live just as they had lived " before, that he sat up whole nights to change a " sentence, because the sound of a letter was too " often repeated, that he was often disquieted with " doubts, about the propriety of a word which every " body understood, that he would hesitate between "two expressions equally proper, till he could not " fix his choice but by consulting his friends, that " he will run from one end of Pais to the other, for " an opportunity of reading a period to a nice ear; " that if a single line is heard with coldness and inat-" tention, he returns home dejected and disconsolate; " and that by all this care and labour, he hopes only " to make a little book, which at last will teach no " useful art, and which none who has it not will per" ceive himself to wint I have often wondered for "what end such a being as this was sent into the world, and should be glad to see those who live thus "foolishly seized by in order of the government and obliged to labour at some useful occupation".

Thus, by a partial and imperfect representation, may every thing be made equally ridiculous. He that gazed with contempt on human beings rubbing stones together, might have prolonged the same amusement by walking through the city, and seeing others with looks of importance heaping one brick upon another, or by rambling into the country, where he might observe other creatures of the same kind driving a piece of sharp iron into the clay, or in the language of men less enlightened, ploughing the field.

As it is thus easy by a detail of minute circumstances to make every thing little so it i not diffi cult by an aggregation of effects to make everything great The polisher of marble may be forming orna ments for the palaces of virtue and the schools of science, or providing tables on which the actions of heroes and the discoveries of sages shall be recorded, for the incitement and instruction of future genera tions The mason is exercising one of the principal arts by which reasoning beings are distinguished from the brute, the art to which life owes much of its safety and all its convenience by which we are se cured from the inclemency of the seasons, and fortified against the ravages of hostility, and the ploughman is changing the face of nature diffusing plenty and happiness over kingdoms, and compelling the earth to give food to her inhabitants

Greatness and littleness are terms merely comparative, and we err in our estimation of things, because we measure them by some wrong standard The tufler proposes to himself only to equal or excel some other trifler, and is happy or miserable as he succeeds or miscarries the man of sedentary desire and unactive ambition sits comparing his power with his wishes, and makes his mability to perform things impossible, an excuse to himself for performing nothing Man can only form a just estimate of his own actions, by making his power the test of his performance, by comparing what he does with what he can Whoever steadily perseveres in the exertion of all his faculties, does what is great with respect to himself, and what will not be despised by Him, who has given to all created beings their different abilities. he faithfully performs the task of life, within whatever limits his labours may be confined, or how soon soever they may be forgotten

We can conceive so much more than we can accomplish, that whoever tries his own actions by his imagination, may appear despicable in his own eyes He that despises for its littleness any thing really useful, has no pretensions to applaud the grandeur of his conceptions, since nothing but nairowness of mind hinders him from seeing, that by pursuing the same principles every thing limited will appear contemptible

He that neglects the care of his family, while his benevolence expands itself in scheming the happiness of imaginary kingdoms, might with equal reason sit on a thione dreaming of universal empire, and of the diffusion of blessings over all the globe:

yet even this globe is little, compared with the system of matter within our view 1 and that system barely something more than nonentity compared with the boundless regions of space to which neither eye nor imagination can extend

From conceptions, therefore of what we might have been, and from wishes to be what we are not, conceptions that we know to be foolish and wishes which we feel to be vain we must necessarily de seend to the consideration of what ve are. We have powers very scanty in their utmost extent, but which in different men are differently proportioned. Suit ably to these powers we have duties prescribed, which we must neither decline for the sake of delighting ourselves with easier imusement, nor overlook in alle contemplation of greater e cellence or more extensive comprehension.

In order to the right conduct of our lives, we must remember, that we are not born to please ourselves. He that studies simply his own satisfaction, will always find the proper business of his station too hard or too easy for him. But if we be in continually in mind our relation to The Pather of Being by whom we are placed in the world, and who has allotted us the part which we are to bear in the general system of life, we shall be easily persuaded to resign our own inclinations to Unering Wisdom, and do the work decreed for us with cheerfulness and diligence

FONTENELLE, in his panegyrick on Sir Isaac Newton, closes a long enumeration of that great philosopher's virtues and attainments, with an observation, that "he was not distinguished from other men, by any singularity either natural or affected"

It is an eminent instance of Newton's superiority to the rest of mankind, that he was able to separate knowledge from those weaknesses by which knowledge is generally disgraced, that he was able to excel in science and wisdom, without purchasing them by the neglect of little things, and that he stood alone, merely because he had left the rest of mankind behind him, not because he deviated from the beaten track

Whoever, after the example of Plutarch, should compare the lives of illustrious men, might set this part of Newton's character to view with great advantage, by opposing it to that of Bacon, perhaps the only man of later ages, who has any pretensions to dispute with him the palm of genius or science.

Bacon, after he had added to a long and car eful contemplation of almost every other object of knowledge a curious inspection into common life, and after having surveyed nature as a philosopher, had examined "men a business and bosoms" as a statesman yet failed so much in the conduct of domestick affairs, that, in the most lucrative post to which a great and wealthy kingdom could advance him, he felt all the micross of distressful poverty, and committed all the crimes to which poverty incites. Such were at once his negligence and rapacity, that as it is said, he would gain by unworthy practices that money, which, when so acquired, his servants might steal from one end of the table while he sat studious and abstracted at the other

As searcely any man has reached the excellence, very few have sunk to the weakness of Bacon but almost all the studious tribe, as they obtain any participation of his knowledge, feel likewise some contagion of his defects and obstruct the veneration which learning would procure, by follows greater or less to which only learning could betray them

It has been formedly remarked by The Guardian that the world punishes with too great severity the crours of those, who imagine that the ignorance of little things may be comparated by the knowledge of great, for so it is that as more can detect petty failings than can distinguish or esteem great qualifications and as mankind is in general more easily disposed to densure than to admiration, contempt is often incurred by slight mistakes which real virtue or usefulness cannot counterbalance

Yet such mistakes and inadvertencies at is not easy for a man deeply immersed in study to a oid, no man can become qualified for the common intercourses of life, by private meditation, the manners of the world are not a regular system, planned by philosophers upon settled principles, in which every cause has a congruous effect, and one part has a just reference to another. Of the fashions prevalent in every country, a few have arisen, perhaps, from particular temperatures of the climate, a few more from the constitution of the government, but the greater part have grown up by chance, been started by caprice, been contrived by affectation, or borrowed without any just motives of choice from other countries

Of all these, the savage that hunts his prey upon the mountains, and the sage that speculates in his closet, must necessarily live in equal ignorance, yet by the observation of these trifles it is, that the ranks of mankind are kept in order, that the address of one to another is regulated, and the general business of the world carried on with facility and method.

These things, therefore, though small in themselves, become great by their frequency, and he very much mistakes his own interest, who, to the unavoidable unskilfulness of abstraction and retirement, adds a voluntary neglect of common forms, and increases the disadvantages of a studious course of life by an arrogant contempt of those practices, by which others endeavour to gain favour and multiply friendships

A real and interiour disdam of fashion and ceremony is, indeed, not very often to be found. much the greater part of those who pretend to laugh at foppery and formality, secretly wish to have possessed those qualifications which they pretend to despise; and because they find it difficult to wash away the tincture which they have so deeply im-

bibed endeatour to harden themselves in a sullen approbation of their own colour. Neutrality is a state, into which the busy passions of man cannot easily subside and he who is in danger of the pangs of entry is generally forced to recreate his imagination with an effort of coinfort.

Some however, may be found who, supported by the consciousness of great abilities and elevated by a long course of reputation and applause voluntarily consign themselves to singularity affect to cross the roads of life because they know that they shall not be justled and indulge a boundless gratification of will because they perceive that they hall be quietly obeyed Men of this kind me generally I nown by the name of Humorists, an appellation by which he that has obtained it, and can be contented to keep it, is set free at once from the shackles of fashion and can go in or out, sit or stand be talkative or silent, gloomy or merry, advance absurdatics or oppose demonstration without any other reprehension from mankind than that it is his way that he is an odd fellow and must be let alone

This seems to many an easy presport through the various factions of mankind, and those on whom it is bestowed appear too frequently to consider the patience with which their caprices are suffered as an undoubted evidence of their own importance, of a genius to which submission is universally paid, and whose irregularities are only considered as consequences of its vigour. These peculiarities, however, are always found to spot a character, though they may not totally obscure it and he who expects from mankind, that they should give up established customs in compliance with his single will, and exacts that deference which he does not pay, may be endured, but can never be approved

Singularity is, I think, in its own nature universally and invariably displeasing. In whatever respect a man differs from others, he must be considered by them as either worse or better, by being better, it is well known that a man gains admiration oftener than love, since all approbation of his practice must necessarily condemn him that gives it, and though a man often pleases by inferiority, there are few who desire to give such pleasure. Yet the truth is, that singularity is almost always regarded as a brand of slight reproach, and where it is associated with acknowledged merit, serves as an abatement or an allay of excellence, by which weak eyes are reconciled to its lustre, and by which, though kindness is not gained, at least envy is averted

But let no man be in haste to conclude his own merit so great or conspicuous, as to require or justify singularity: it is as hazardous for a moderate understanding to usuip the pierogatives of genius, as for a common form to play over the airs of uncontested beauty. The pride of men will not patiently endure to see one, whose understanding or attainments are but level with their own, break the rules by which they have consented to be bound, or forsake the direction which they submissively follow All violation of established practice implies in its own nature a rejection of the common opinion, a defiance of common censure, and an appeal from general laws to private judgment. he, therefore, who differs from others without apparent advantage ought not to be angry if his arrogance is punished punished with ridicule, if those, whose example he supercitionsly overlooks, point him out to derision, and hoot him back again into the common road

The pride of singularity is often exerted in little things, where right and wrong are indeterminable, and where, therefore, vanity is without excuse. But there are occasions on which it is noble to dare to stand alone. To be pions among infidels, to be disinterested in a time of general vendity, to lead a life of virtue and reason in the midst of sensualists, is a proof of a mind intent on nobler things than the pruse or blame of men, of a soul fixed in the contemplation of the highest good, and superiour to the tyranny of custom and example

In moral and religious questions only, a wise man will hold no consultations with fishion, because these duties are constant and immutable, and depend not on the notions of men, but the commands of Herven yet even of these, the external mode is to be in some mea sure regulated by the prevailing taste of the age in which we like, for he is certainly no friend to virtue, who neglects to give it involved intraction, or suffers it to deceive the eye or alienate the affections for want of innocent compliance with fashionable decorations.

It is yet remembered of the learned and pious Welson, that he was remarkably elegant in his man ners, and splendid in his dress. He know, that the eminence of his character diew many eyes upon him, and he was careful not to dive the young or the gry away from religion, by representing it as an enemy to my distinction or enjoyment in which human nature may innocently delight.

In this censure of singularity, I have, therefore, no intention to subject reason or conscience to custom or example. To comply with the notions and practices of mankind, is in some degree the duty of a social being, because by compliance only he can please, and by pleasing only he can become useful—but as the end is not to be lost for the sake of the means, we are not to give up viitue to complaisance, for the end of complaisance is only to gain the kindness of our fellow beings, whose kindness is desirable only as instrumental to happiness, and happiness must be always lost by departure from viitue.

What have I been doing?

As man is a being very sparingly furnished with the power of prescience, he can provide for the future only by considering the past, and as futurity is all in which he has any real interest, he ought very diligently to use the only means by which he can be enabled to enjoy it, and frequently to revolve the experiments which he has hitherto made upon life, that he may gain wisdom from his mistakes, and caution from his miscarriages

Though I do not so exactly conform to the precepts of Pythagoras, as to practise every night this solemn recollection, yet I am not so lost in dissipation as wholly to omit it, nor can I forbear sometimes to inquire of myself, in what employment my life has passed away

Much

Much of my time has sunk into nothing, and left no trace by which it can be distinguished, and of this I now only know, that it was once in my power, and might once have been improved

Of other parts of life, memory can give some account, at some hours I have been gay and at others serious, I have sometimes mingled in conversation, and sometimes meditated in solitude, one day has been spent in consulting the ancient sages, and another in writing Adventurers

At the conclusion of my undertaking it is usual to compute the los and profit. As I shall soon cease to write Advanturers, I could not forbear! itely to consider what has been the consequence of my labours, and whether I am to reel on the hours had out in the e-compositions, as applied to a good and laud ble purpose, or suffered to fume away in useless evaporations.

That I have intended well. I have the attestation of my own heart, but good intentions may be frustrated when they are executed without suitable shill, or directed to an end unattainable in itself.

Some there are, who leave write svery little room for self congratulation, some who affirm that books have no influence upon the publick, that no age was ever made better by its authors, and that to call upon mankind to correct their manners, is like Verxes, to scourge the wind or shackle the torrent

This opinion they pretend to support by unfuling experience. The world is full of fraud and corruption, rapine or malignity, interest is the ruling motive of mankind, and every one is endeavouring to increase his own stores of happiness by perpetual accumula tion, without reflecting upon the numbers whom his superfluity condemns to want in this state of things a book of morality is published, in which charity and benevolence are strongly enforced, and it is proved beyond opposition, that men are happy in proportion as they are virtuous, and rich as they are liberal. The book is applauded, and the author is preferred, he imagines his applause deserved, and receives less pleasure from the acquisition of reward than the consciousness of ment. Let us look again upon mankind interest is still the ruling motive, and the world is yet full of fiaud and corruption, malevolence and rapine.

The difficulty of confuting this assertion, arises merely from its generality and comprehension. to overthrow it by a detail of distinct facts, requires a wider survey of the world than human eyes can take; the progress of reformation is gradual and silent, as the extension of evening shadows, we know that they were short at noon, and are long at sunset, but our senses were not able to discern their increase: we know of every civil nation, that it was once savage, and how was it reclaimed but by a piecept and admonition?

Mankind are universally corrupt, but corrupt in different degrees, as they are universally ignorant, yet with greater or less irradiations of knowledge. How has knowledge or virtue been increased and preserved in one place beyond another; but by diligent inculcation and rational inforcement?

Books of morality are daily written, yet its influence is still little in the world, so the ground is annually ploughed, and yet multitudes are in want of bread.

But,

Nº 137 THE ADVENTURER

But, surely, neither the labours of the moralist of the husbandman are vain let them for a whineglect their tasks, and their usefulness will known, the wickedness that is now frequent won become universal, the bread that is now scarce won

wholly fail

The power, indeed, of every individual is small, a the consequence of his endeavours imperceptible a general prospect of the world Providence is given no man ability to do much that somethi

might be left for every min to do. The business life is carried on by a general cooperation, in which the part of any single man can be no more distinguished, than the effect of a particular drop when the meadows are floated by a summer shower of yet every hand and to the happiness or misery of mankind

That a writer, however zerdous or eloquent, seldo works a visible effect upon cities or nations w readily be granted. The book which is read most, readby few compared with those that read it not, an of those few, the greater part peruse it with dispositions that very little favour their own improvement. It is difficult to enumerate the several motives which

It is difficult to enumerate the several motives which procure to books the honour of peru all spite, vanity and curiosity, hope and fear, love and hatred, ever passion which incites to any other action, serves a one time or other to stimulate a reader.

Some are fond to take a celebrated volume into their hands because they hope to distinguish their penetration, by finding fulls which have escaped th publick, others eagerly buy it in the first bloom of reputation, that they may join the chorus of praise and not lag, as Falstaff terms it, in "the rearward of the fashion"

Some read for style, and some for argument one has little care about the sentiment, he observes only how it is expressed, another regards not the conclusion, but is diligent to mark how it is inferred they read for other purposes than the attainment of practical knowledge, and are no more likely to grow wise by an examination of a treatise of moral prudence, than an architect to inflame his devotion by considering attentively the proportions of a temple

Some read that they may embellish their conversation, or shine in dispute, some that they may not be detected in ignorance, or want the reputation of literary accomplishments: but the most general and prevalent reason of study is the impossibility of finding another amusement equally cheap or constant, equally independent on the hour or the weather.
He that wants money to follow the chase of pleasure through her yearly circuit, and is left at home when the gay world rolls to Bath or Tunbridge, he whose gout compels him to hear from his chamber the rattle of chariots transporting happier beings to plays and assemblies, will be forced to seek in books a refuge from himself

The author is not wholly useless, who provides innocent amusements for minds like these. There are, in the present state of things, so many more instigations to evil, than incitements to good, that he who keeps men in a neutral state, may be justly considered as a benefactor to life.

But, perhaps, it seldom happens, that study terminates in mere pastime. Books have always a secret influence influence on the understanding we cannot at 'pleasure obliterate ideas he that reads books of science, though without any fixed desire of improvement, will grow more knowing, he that entertains himself with moral or religious treatises, will imperceptibly advance in goodness, the ideas which are often offered to the mind, will at last find a lucky moment when it is disposed to receive them

It is therefore, urged without reason as a discouragement to writers that there are already books sufficient in the world, that all the topicks of persuasion have been discussed, and every important question clearly stated and justly decided, and that therefore, there is no room to hope, that pigmies should conquer where heroes have been defeated, or that the petty copiers of the present time should advance the great work of reformation, which their predecessors were forced to leave unfinished

Whatever be the present extent of human know ledge, it is not only finite, and therefore in its own nature capable of increase, but so narrow, that almost every understanding may, by a diligent application of its powers, hope to enlarge it. It is however, not necessary, that a man should forbear to write till he has discovered some truth unknown before he may be sufficiently useful by only diversifying the surface of knowledge, and luring the mind by a new appearance to a second view of those beauties which it had passed over mattentively before. Every writer may find intellects correspondent to his own to whom his expressions are familiar and his thoughts congenial and perhaps truth is often more successfully propagated by men of moderate abilities, who adopting the opinions of others, have no care but to explain them clearly, than by subtle speculatists and curious searchers, who exact from their readers powers equal to their own, and if their fabricks of science be strong, take no care to render them accessible

For my part, I do not regret the hours which I have laid out in these little compositions. That the world has grown apparently better, since the publication of the Adventurer, I have not observed; but am willing to think, that many have been affected by single sentiments, of which it is their business to renew the impression, that many have caught hints of truth, which it is now their duty to pursue, and that those who have received no improvement, have wanted not opportunity but intention to improve.

HAVING considered the importance of authors to the welfare of the publick, I am led by a natural train of thought, to reflect on their condition with regard to themselves, and to inquire what degree of happiness or vention is annexed to the difficult and laborious employment of providing instruction or entertainment for mankind

In estimating the pain or pleasure of any particular state, every man, indeed, draws his decisions from his own breast, and cannot with certainty determine, whether other minds are affected by the same causes in the same manner. Yet by this criterion we must be content to judge, because no other can be obtained, and, indeed, we have no reason to think it very fallacious, for excepting here and there an anomalous mind, which either does not feel like others, or dissembles its sensibility we find men unanimously concur in attributing happiness or misery to particular conditions, as they agree in ac knowledging the cold of winter and the heat of autumn

If we apply to authors themselves for an account of their state, it will appear very little to deserve envy, for they have in all ages been addicted to complaint. The neglect of learning, the ingratitude of the present age, and the absurd preference by which ignorance and dulness often obtain favour and rewards, have been from age to age topicks of invective, and few have left their names to posterity, without some appeal to future candour from the perverseness and malice of their own times

I have, nevertheless, been often inclined to doubt, whether authors, however querulous, are in reality more miserable than their fellow mortals. The present life is to all a state of infelicity, every man, like an author, believes himself to merit more than he obtains, and solaces the present with the prospect of the future, others, indeed, suffer those disappointments in silence, of which the writer complains, to show how well he has learnt the art of lamentation

There is at least one gleam of felicity, of which few writers have missed the enjoyment he whose hopes have so far overpowered his fears, as that he has resolved to stand forth-a candidate for fame, seldom fails to amuse himself, before his appearance, with pleasing scenes of affluence or honour, while his fortune is yet under the regulation of fancy, he easily models it to his wish, suffers no thoughts of criticks or rivals to intrude upon his mind, but counts over the bounties of patronage, or listens to the voice of praise

Some there are, that talk very luxurously of the second period of an author's happiness, and tell of the tumultuous raptures of invention, when the mind

riots in imagery, and the choice stands suspended between different animents

These pleasures, I believe, may sometimes be in dulged to those, who come to a subject of disquisition with minds full of ideas, and with fraces so vigorous as easily to excite, select and arrange them. To write is indeed, no unpleating employment, when one sentiment readily produces another, and both ideas and expressions present themselves at the first summons but such happiness, the greatest genius does not always obtain, and common writers know it only to such a degree, as to credit its possibility. Composition is, for the most part, an effort of slow diligence and steady personerance, to which the mind is dragged by necessity or resolution, and from which the attention is every moment starting to more delightful unusuements.

It frequently happens that a design which, when considered at a distance give flattering hopes of ficility, mocks us in the execution with unexpected difficulties, the mind v high, while it considered it in the gross imagined itself amply furnished with materials, finds sometimes an unexpected barrenness and vacuity, and wonders whither all those ide is are vanished, which a little before seemed struggling for emission

Sometimes many thoughts present themselves, but so confused and unconnected, that they are not without difficulty reduced to method, or concate nated in a regular and dependent series the mind fills it once into a labyrinth, of which neither the beginning noi end can be discovered, and toils and struggles without progress or extrication.

It is asserted by Horace, that "if matter be once "got together, words will be found with very little "difficulty," a position which, though sufficiently plausible to be inserted in poetical precepts, is by no means strictly and philosophically true. If words were naturally and necessarily consequential to sentiments, it would always follow, that he who has most knowledge must have most eloquence, and that every man would clearly express what he fully understood yet we find, that to think, and discourse, are often the qualities of different persons and many books might surely be produced, where just and noble sentiments are degraded and obscured by unsuitable diction.

Words, therefore, as well as things, claim the care of an author. Indeed of many authors, and those not useless or contemptible, words are almost the only care many make it their study, not so much to strike out new sentiments, as to recommend those which are already known to more favourable notice by fairer decorations but every man, whether he copies or invents, whether he delivers his own thoughts or those of another, has often found himself deficient in the power of expression, big with ideas which he could not utter, obliged to ransack his memory for terms adequate to his conceptions, and at last unable to impress upon his reader the image existing in his own mind

It is one of the common distresses of a writer, to be within a word of a happy period, to want only a single epithet to give amplification its full force, to require only a correspondent term in order to finish a paragraph with elegance, and make one of its members answer to the other but these deficiencies cannot always be supplied, and after a long study and accation, the passage is turned anew, and the web unwoven that was so nearly finished

But when thoughts and words are collected and adjusted, and the whole composition at last concluded it seldom gratifies the author, when he comes coolly and deliberately to review it, with the hopes which had been excited in the fury of the performance novelty always captivates the mind, as our thoughts rise fresh upon us, we readily believe them just and original, which when the pleasure of production is over, we find to be mean and common, or borrowed from the works of others, and supplied by memory rather than invention

1 But though it should happen that the writer finds no such faults in his perform ince he is still to remember, that he looks upon it with partial eyes and when he considers, how much men who could judge of others with great exactness, have often failed of judging of themselves, he will be afraid of deciding too hastily in his own favour, for of allowing himself to contemplate with too much complacence, treasure that has not yet been brought to the test, nor passed the only trail that can stamp its value

From the publick, and only from the publick, is he to await a confirmation of his claim, and a final justification of self esteem, but the publick is not easily persuaded to favour in author. If mankind were left to judge for themselves, it is reasonable to imagine, that of such writings at least, as describe the move ments of the human passions, and of which every man carries the archety pe within him, a just opinion would be formed, but who ever has remarked the fate of books, must have found it governed by other causes, than general consent arising from general conviction. If a new performance happens not to fall into the hands of some who have comege to tell, and authority to propagate their opinion, it often remains long in obscurity, and perishes unknown and unexamined. A few, a very few, commonly constitute the taste of the time, the judgment which they have once pronounced, some are too lazy to discuss, and some too timorous to contradict: it may however be, I think, observed, that their power is greater to depress than exalt, as mankind are more credulous of censure than of praise

This perversion of the publick judgment is not to be rashly numbered amongst the miseries of an author; since it commonly serves, after miscarriage, to reconcile him to himself. Because the world has sometimes passed an unjust sentence, he readily concludes the sentence unjust by which his performance is condemned, because some have been exalted above their ments by partiality, he is sure to ascribe the success of a rival, not to the ment of his work, but the zeal of his patrons. Upon the whole, as the author seems to share all the common miseries of life, he appears to partake likewise of its lenitives and abatements.

RASSELAS,

PRINCE OF ABISSINIA

This work was published in March or April 1759 Dr Johnson wrote it in order to defray the expenses of his mother's funeral, and pay some little debts which she had left. He told Sir Joshua Reynolds that he composed it in the evenings of one week, sent it to the press in portions as it was written, and had never since read it over. Mr. Strahan, Mr. Johnston, and Mr. Dodsley, purchased it for a hundred pounds, but afterwards paid him twenty-five pounds more, when it came to a second edition. None of his writings has been so extensively diffused over Europe. for it has been translated into most, if not all, of the modern languages. Boswell. C.

DESCRIPTION OF A PALACE IN A VALLEY

Y E who listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope, who expect that age will perform the promises of youth, and that the deficiencies of the present day will be supplied by the morrow attend to the history of Rasselas Prince of Abissima.

Rasselas was the fourth son of the mighty emperour, in whose dominions the Tather of Waters begins his course, whose bounty pours down the streams of plenty and scatters over half the world the harvests of Egypt

According to the custom which has descended from age to age among the monarchs of the torrid zone, Rasselas was confined in a private palace, with the other sons and daughters of Abissiman royalty, till the order of succession should call him to the throne

The place, which the wisdom or policy of untiquity had destined for the residence of the Abissiman

Amhaia, surrounded on every side by mountains of which the summits overhang the middle part. The only passage, by which it could be entered, was a cavern that passed under a rock, of which it has long been disputed whether it was the work of nature or of human industry. The outlet of the cavern was concealed by thick wood, and the mouth which opened into the valley was closed with gates of non, forged by the artificers of ancient days, so massy that no man could without the help of engines open or shut them.

From the mountains on every side, invites descended that filled all the valley with verdure and fertility, and formed a lake in the middle inhabited by fish of every species, and frequented by every fowl whom nature has taught to dip the wing in water. This lake discharged its superfluities by a stream which entered a dark cleft of the mountain on the northern side, and fell with dreadful noise from precipice to precipice till it was heard no more

The sides of the mountains were covered with trees, the banks of the brooks were diversified with flowers; every blast shook spices from the rocks, and every month dropped fruits upon the ground. All animals that bite the grass, or browse the shrub, whether wild or tame, wandered in this extensive circuit, secured from beasts of prey by the mountains which confined them. On one part were flocks and herds feeding in the pastures, on another all the beasts of chase firsking in the lawns, the sprightly kid was bounding on the rocks, the subtle monkey frolicking in the trees, and the solemn elephant reposing in the shade. All the

diversities of the world were brought together, the blessings of initure were collected, and its evils extracted and excluded

The valley, wide and fruitful, supplied its inhabi tants with the necessaries of life, and all delights and superfluities were added at the annual visit which the emperour paid his children when the iron gate was opened to the sound of musick and durin, eight days every one that resided in the valley was required to propose whatever might contribute to make seclusion pleasant to fill up the vacancies of attention, and lessen the tediousness of time Every desire was immediately granted All the artificers of pleasure were called to gladden the festivity, the musicions exerted the power of harmony, and the dancers showed their activity before the princes, in hope that they should pass their lives in this blissful captivity. to which those only were admitted whose perform ance was thought able to add novelty to luxury Such was the appearance of security and delight which this retirement afforded, that they to whom it was new, always desired that it might be perpetual, and as those on whom the iron gate had once closed. were never suffered to return, the effect of long ex perience could not be known Thus every year pro duced new schemes of delight, and new competitors for imprisonment

The pulse stood on an eminence raised about thirty paces above the stirface of the lake. It was divided into many squares or courts, built with greater or less magnificence according to the rank of those for whom they were designed. The roofs were turned into arches of massy stone, joined by a cement that grew harder

by time, and the building stood from century to century deciding the solstitial rains and equinoctial hurricanes, without need of reparation

This house, which was so large as to be fully known to none but some ancient officers who successively inherited the secrets of the place, was built as if suspicion herself had dictated the plan. To every room there was an open and secret passage, every square had a communication with the rest, either from the upper stories by private galleries, or by subterranean passages from the lower apartments. Many of the columns had unsuspected cavities, in which a long race of monarchs had reposited their treasures They then closed up the opening with maible, which was never to be removed but in the utmost exigencies of the kingdom, and recorded their accumulations in a book which was itself concealed in a tower not entered but by the emperour, attended by the prince who stood next in succession

THE DISCONTENT OF RASSLLAS IN THE HAPPY VALLLY

Here the sons and daughters of Abissinia lived only to know the soft vicissitudes of pleasure and repose, attended by all that were skilful to delight, and gratified with whatever the senses can enjoy. They wandered in gardens of fragrance, and slept in the fortresses of security. Every art was practised to make them pleased with their own condition. The sages who instructed them, told them of nothing but the miseries of publick life, and described all beyond the mountains as regions of culamity, where discord was always raging and where man preyed upon man

To heighten their opinion of their own felicity, they were duly entertuned with songs, the subject of which was the happy calley. Then appetites were excited by frequent enumerations of different enjoy ments, and revelve and merriment was the business of every hour from the dawn of morning to the close of every.

These methods were generally successful, few of the punces had ever wished to enlarge their bounds but passed their lives in full conviction that they had all within their reach that are or nature could bestow, and pitied tho e whom fite had excluded from this seat of trinquillity, as the sport of chance and the slaves of misery

Thus they rose in the morning and lay down at night, pleased with cach other and with themselves, all but Rasselas who in the twenty sixth year of his age began to withdraw himself from their pastimes and assemblies, and to delight in solitary walks and silent meditation. He often sat before tables covered with luxury, and forgot to taste the dainties that were placed before him the rose ibruptly in the midst of the song, and hastily retired beyond the sound of musick. His attendants observed the change and endeavoured to renew his love of pleasure the neglicated their officiousness repulsed their mytations, and spent day after day on the band's of rivulets shall tered with trees where he sometimes listened to the birds in the branches, sometimes observed the fish playing in the stream, and anon cast his eyes upon the pastures and mountains filled with animals, of which some were biting the herbage, and some sleeping among the bushes

This singularity of his humour made him much observed. One of the Sages, in whose conversation he had formerly delighted, followed him secretly, in hope of discovering the cause of his disquiet. Rasselas, who knew not that any one was near him, having for some time fixed his eyes upon the goats that were browsing among the rocks, began to compare their condition with his own.

"What, said he, makes the difference between man and all the rest of the animal creation? Every beast that strays beside me has the same corporal necessities with myself, he is hungry and crops the grass, he is thirsty and drinks the stream, his thirst and hunger are appeased, he is satisfied and sleeps: he rises again and is hungry, he is again fed and is at rest ~I am hungiy and thusty like him, but when thirst and hunger cease I am not at rest; I am, like him, pained with want, but am not, like him, satisfied with fulness The intermediate hours are tedious and gloomy, I long again to be lingly that I may again quicken my attention. The birds peck the beiries or the corn, and fly away to the groves, where they sit in seeming happiness on the branches, and waste their lives in tuning one unvaried series of I likewise can call the lutanist and the singer, but the sounds that pleased me yesterday weary me to-day, and will grow yet more wearisome to-morrow. I can discover within me no power of perception which is not glutted with its proper pleasure,

pleasure, yet I do not feel myself delighted. Man surely has some latent sense for which this place affords no gratification, or he has some desires distinct from sense, which must be satisfied before he can be happy

After this he lifted up his head, and seeing the moon rising, walked towards the palace. As he passed through the fields, and saw the animals around him, "Ye, said he, are happy, and need not enty me that walk thus among you, burdened with my self, not do I, ye gentle beings, early your felicity, for it is not the felicity of man. I have many distresses from which ye are free. I fear pain when I do not feel it, I sometimes shrink at earls recollected and sometimes start at earls anticipated surely the equity of Providence has balanced peculiar sufferings with peculiar enjoyments.

With observations like these the prince amused himself as he returned, uttering them with a plaintive voice, yet with a look that discovered him to feel some complacence in his own perspicacity, and to receive some solace of the miseries of life, from con sciousness of the delicacy with which he felt and the cloquence with which he bewarled them. He min gled cheerfully in the diversions of the evening and all rejoiced to find that his heart was lightened.

THE WANTS OF HIM THAT WANTS NOTHING

officiously sought an opportunity of conference, which the prince, having long considered him as one whose intellects were exhausted, was not very willing to afford "Why, said he, does this man thus obtrude upon me, shall I be never suffered to forget those lectures which pleased only while they were new, and to become new again must be forgotten?" He then walked into the wood, and composed himself to his usual meditations, when before his thoughts had taken any settled form, he perceived his pursuer at his side, and was at first prompted by his impatience to go hastily away, but, being unwilling to offend a man whom he had once reverenced and still loved, he invited him to sit down with him on the bank

The old man thus encouraged, began to lament the change which had been lately observed in the prince, and to inquire why he so often retired from the pleasures of the palace, to loneliness and silence. " I fly from pleasure, said the prince, because pleasuie has ceased to please, I am lonely because I am miserable, and am unwilling to cloud with my presence the happiness of others" "You, Sn, said the sage, are the first who has complained of misery in the happy valley I hope to convince you that your complaints have no real cause You are here in full possession of all that the emperour of Abissima can bestow, here is neither labour to be endured nor danger to be dreaded, yet here is all that labour or danger can procure or purchase Look round and tell me which of your wants is without supply if you want nothing, how are you unhappy?"

Y"That I want nothing, said the prince, or that I

know not what I want, is the cause of my complaint, if I had any known want, I should have a certain wish, that wish would excite endeavour, and I should not then repine to see the sun move so slowly to wards the western mountain, or lament when the day breaks and sleep will no longer hide me from myself When I see the kids and the lambs chasing one an other, I funcy that I should be happy if I had some thing to pursue But, possessing all that I can want, I find one day and one hour exactly like another, except that the latter is still more tedious than the former Let your experience inform me how the day may now seem as short as in my childhood, while nature was yet fresh, and every moment showed me what I never had observed before I have already enjoyed too much, give me something to desire

The old man was surprised at this new species of affliction, and knew not what to reply, yet was un willing to be silent "Sir, said he, if you had seen the miseries of the world, you would know how to value vour present state ' Now, said the prince. you have given me something to desire, I shall long to see the miseries of the world, since the sight of them is necessary to happiness"

THE PRINCE CONTINUES TO GRIEVE AND MUSE

At this time the sound of musick proclumed the hour of repast and the conversation was concluded The old man went away sufficiently discontented to find that his reasonings had produced the only con clusion \ 4

clusion which they were intended to prevent. But in the decline of life shame and grief are of short duration, whether it be that we bear easily what we have born long, or that, finding ourselves in age less regarded, we less regard others, or, that we look with slight regard upon afflictions, to which we know that the hand of death is about to put an end.

The prince, whose views were extended to a wider space, could not speedily quiet his emotions. He had been before terrified at the length of life which nature promised him, because he considered that in a long time much must be endured; he now rejoiced in his youth, because in many years much might be done.

This first beam of hope, that had been ever darted into his mind, rekindled youth in his cheeks, and doubled the lustre of his eyes. He was fired with the desire of doing something, though he knew not yet with distinctness, either end or means

He was now no longer gloomy and unsocial, but, considering himself as master of a secret stock of happiness, which he could enjoy only by concealing it, he affected to be busy in all schemes of diversion, and endeavoured to make others pleased with the state of which he himself was weary. But pleasures never can be so multiplied or continued, as not to leave much of life unemployed, there were many hours, both of the night and day, which he could spend without suspicion in solitary thought. The load of life was much lightened, he went eagerly into the assemblies, because he supposed the frequency of his presence necessary to the success of his purposes, he retired gladly to privacy, because he had now a subject of thought.

His chief amusement was to picture to himself that world which he had never seen to place himself in various conditions to be entangled in imaginary difficulties and to be engaged in wild adjentures but his benevolence always terminated his projects in the relief of distress the detection of fraud, the defeat of oppression, and the diffusion of happmess

Thus passed twenty months of the life of Rasselas He busied himself so intensely in visionary bustle, that he forgot his real solitude, and amidst hourly preparations for the various incidents of human affairs neglected to consider by what means he should mingle with mankind

One day as he was sitting on a bank he feigned to himself an orphan virgin robbed of her little portion by a treacherous lover, and crying after him for restitution and redress. So strongly was the image impressed upon his mind that he started up in the maids defence and run forward to seize the plun derer with all the eigeness of real pursuit. Fear naturally quickens the flight of guilt. Rasselas could not eatch the fugitive with his utmost efforts but resolving to weary by perseverance him whom he could not surpass in speed he pressed on till the toot of the mount in stopped his course.

Here he recollected himself and smiled at his own useless impetuosity. Then ruising his eyes to the mountain. This said he is the fital obstricte that hinders at once the enjoyment of pleasure and the evercise of virtue. How long is it that my of my life, which yet I never have attempted to surmount!

Struck with this reflection, he sat down to muse; and remembered, that since he first resolved to escape from his confinement, the sun had passed twice over him in his annual course. He now felt a degree of regret with which he had never been before acquainted. He considered how much might have been done in the time which had passed, and left nothing real behind it. He compared twenty months with the life of man "In life, said he, is not to be counted the ignorance of infancy, or imbecility of age We are long before we are able to think, and we soon cease from the power of acting. The true period of human existence may be reasonably estimated at forty years, of which I have mused away the four and twentieth part What I have lost was certain, for I have certainly possessed it, but of twenty months to come who can assure me?"

The consciousness of his own folly pierced him deeply, and he was long before he could be reconciled to himself "The rest of my time, said he, has been lost by the crime or folly of my ancestors, and the absurd institutions of my country, I remember it with disgust, yet without remoise. but the months that have passed since new light darted into my soul, since I formed a scheme of reasonable felicity, have been squandered by my own fault I have lost that which can never be restored. I have seen the sun use and set for twenty months, an idle gazer on the light of heaven. In this time the buds have left the nest of then mother, and committed themselves to the woods and to the skies the kid has forsaken the teat, and learned by degrees to climb the rocks in quest of independent sustenance I only have made no advances, but am still helpless and ignorant. The moon, by more than twenty changes, admonshed me of the flux of life, the stream that rolled before my feet upbruded my mactivity. I sat feisting on intellectual luxury, regardle salike of the examples of the earth, and the instructions of the planets. Twenty months are passed who half restore them?"

These sorrowful meditations fastened upon his mind, he passed four months in resolving to lose no more time in idle resolves, and was awakened to more vigorous evertion, by hearing a maid who had broken a porcelain cup, iemark, that what cannot be repaired is not to be regretted

This was obvious, and Rasselas reproched him self that he had not discovered it, having not known or not considered, how many useful hints are obtained by chance and how often the mind hurred by her own ardour to distant views, neglects the truths that he open before her. He for a few hours, regretted his regret, and from that time bent his whole mind upon the means of escaping from the valley of happiness.

CHAP V

THE PRINCL MEDITATES HIS ESCAPE

He now found that it would be very difficult to effect that which it was very easy to suppose effected. When he looked round about him, he saw lamself confined by the bars of nature which had never yet been broken, and by the gate, through which none that once had passed it were ever able to return. He was now impatient as an eagle in a grate. He passed week after week in clambering the mountains, to see if there was any aperture which the bushes might conceal, but found all the summits maccessible by their prominence. The non-gate he despaired to open for it was not only secured with all the power of ait, but was always watched by successive sentinels, and was by its position exposed to the perpetual observation of all the inhabitants

He then examined the cavein through which the waters of the lake were discharged; and, looking down at a time when the sun shone strongly upon its mouth, he discovered it to be full of broken rocks, which, though they permitted the stream to flow through many narrow passages, would stop any body of solid bulk. He returned discouraged and dejected, but, having now known the blessing of hope, resolved never to despair.

In these finitless searches he spent ten months. The time, however, passed cheerfully away in the morning he rose with new hope, in the evening applicated his own diligence, and in the night slept sound after his fatigue. He met a thousand amusements which beguiled his labour, and diversified his thoughts. He discerned the various instincts of animals, and properties of plants, and found the place replete with wonders, of which he purposed to solace himself with the contemplation, if he should never be able to accomplish his flight, rejoicing that his endeavours, though yet unsuccessful, had supplied him with a source of inexhaustible inquiry.

But his original curiosity was not yet abated, he resolved to obtain some knowledge of the ways of men.

men His wish still continued, but his hope grew less. He censed to survey any longer the alls of his pri on, and spared to search by new toils for interstices which he knew could not be found yet determined to keep his design always in view and lay hold on any expedient that time should offer

A DISSERTATION ON THE ART OF FLYING

Among the artists that had been allured into the happy valley, to labour for the accommodation and pleasure of its inhabitants was a man eminent for his knowledge of the mechanick powers, who had contrived many engines both of use and recreation By a wheel which the stream turned he forced the water into a tower wheree it was distributed to all the apartments of the palace. He elected a pavilion in the garden, around which he kept the air always cool by irtificial showers. One of the groves appropriated to the ladies, was ventilated by fans, to which the raulet that ran through it give a constant motion and instruments of soft musick were placed at proper distances, of which some played by the impulse of the wind, and some by the power of the stream

This artist was sometimes visited by Rasselas, who was pleased with e ery kind of knowledge imagining that the time would come when all his acqui itions should be of use to him in the open would. He came one day to arruse himself in his usual manner, and found the master busy in building a sailing chariot he saw that the design was practicable upon a level surface, and with expressions of great esteem solicited its completion. The work-man was pleased to find himself so much regarded by the prince, and resolved to gain yet higher honours. "Sin, said he, you have seen but a small part of what the mechanick sciences can perform. I have been long of opinion, that instead of the tardy conveyance of ships and chariots, man might use the swifter migration of wings, that the fields of an are open to knowledge, and that only ignorance and idleness need crawl upon the ground."

This hint rekindled the prince's desire of passing the mountains, having seen what the mechanist had already performed, he was willing to fancy that he could do more; yet resolved to inquire further, before he suffered hope to afflict him by disappointment. I am afiaid, said he to the artist, that your imagination prevails over your skill, and that you now tell me rather what you wish, than what you know Every animal has his element assigned him; the birds have the air, and man and beasts the earth" "So, replied the mechanist, fishes have the water, in which yet beasts can swim by nature, and men by art He that can swim needs not despair to fly. to swim is to fly in a grosser fluid, and to fly is to swim in a subtler We are only to proportion our power of resistance to the different density of matter through which we are to pass You will be necessarily upborn by the air, if you can renew any impulse upon it, faster than the air can recede from the pressure."

"But the exercise of swimming sid the prince, is very laborious, the strongest limbs are soon wearred, I am afraid the act of flying will be vet more violent and wings will be of no great use, unless we can fly further than we can swim

"The labour of rising from the ground said the artist, will be great as we see it in the heavier domestick fowls, but as we mount higher the earth s attraction and the body's gravity, will be gradually diminished, till we shall arrive at a region where the man will float in the air without any tendency to fall no care will then be necessary but to move forwards which the gentlest impulse will effect. You Sir, whose curiosity is so extensive will ensily conceive with what pleasure a philosopher furnished with wings and hovering in the sky would see the eath and all its inhabitants rolling beneath him and presenting to him successively by its diurnal motion all the countries within the same parallel How must it amuse the pendent spectator to see the moving scene of land and ocean cities and deserts! To survey with equal security the marts of trude, and the fields of battle, mountains infested by bar barrans and fruitful regions gladdened by plenty and fulled by peace? How easily shall we then trace the Nile through all his passage, pass over to distant regions and examine the face of nature from one extremity of the earth to the other!'

'All this said the prince is much to be desired but I am afraid that no man will be able to breathe in these regions of speculation and tranquility. I have been told, that respiration is difficult upon lofty mountains. mountains, yet from these precipiees, though so high as to produce great tenuity of air, it is very easy to fall—therefore I suspect, that from any height, where life can be supported, there may be danger of too quick descent."

"Nothing, replied the aitist, will over be attempted, if all possible objections must be first overcome. If you will favour my project, I will try the first flight at my own hazard. I have considered the structure of all volant animals, and find the folding continuity of the bat's wings most easily accommodated to the human form. Upon this model I shall begin my task to-morrow, and in a year expect to tower into the air beyond the malice and pursuit of man. But I will work only on this condition, that the art shall not be divulged, and that you shall not require me to make wings for any but ourselves."

"Why, said Rasselas, should you envy others so great an advantage? All skill ought to be exerted for universal good, every man has owed much to others, and ought to repay the kindness that he has received"

I should with great alaciity teach them all to fly But what would be the security of the good, if the bad could at pleasure invade them from the sky? Against an army sailing through the clouds, neither walls, nor mountains, nor seas, could afford any security. A flight of northern savages might hover in the wind, and light at once with irresistible violence upon the capital of a fruitful region that was rolling under them. Even this valley, the retreat of princes, the abode of happiness,

might be violated by the sudden descent of some of the naked nations that swarm on the coast of the southern sea?

The prince promised secrecy, and waited for the performance, not wholly hopeless of success. He visited the work from time to time, observed its progress and remarked many ingenious contrivances to facilitate motion, and unite levity with strength. The artist was every day more certain that he should leave vultures and eagles behind him, and the contagion of his confidence seized upon the prince.

In a year the wings were finished, and, on a morning appointed, the maker appeared furnished for flight on a little promontory he waved his pinions a while to gather air, then leaped from his stand, and in an instant dropped into the lake. His wings, which were of no use in the air sustained him in the water, and the prince drew him to land, half dead with terrour and yexation.

THE PRINCE FINDS A MAN OF LEARNING

The prince was not much afflicted by this disaster, having suffered himself to hope for a happier event, only because he had no other means of escape in view. He still persisted in his design to leave the happy valley by the first opportunity

His imagination was now at a stand, he had no prospect of entering into the world, and notwith standing all his endeavours to support himself, dis content by degrees preyed upon him, and he began again to lose his thoughts in sadness, when the rainy season, which in these countries is periodical, made it inconvenient to wander in the woods.

The rain continued longer and with more violence than had been ever known—the clouds broke on the surrounding mountains, and the torrents streamed into the plain on every side, till the cavern was too narrow to discharge the water. The lake overflowed its banks, and all the level of the valley was covered with the mundation—The eminence, on which the palace was built, and some other spots of rising ground, were all that the eye could now discover. The herds and flocks left the pastures, and both the wild beasts and the tame retreated to the mountains.

This inundation confined all the princes to domestick amusements, and the attention of Rasselas was particularly seized by a poem, which Imlacicheaised, upon the various conditions of humanity. He conmanded the poet to attend him in his apartment, and recite his verses a second time, then entering into familiar talk, he thought himself happy in having found a man who knew the world so well, and could so skilfully paint the scenes of life asked a thousand questions about things, to which, though common to all other mortals, his confinement from childhood had kept him a stranger pitied his ignorance, and loved his curiosity, and entertained him from day to day with novelty and instruction, so that the prince regretted the necessity of sleep, and longed till the morning should renew his pleasure.

As they were sitting together, the plince commanded Imlac to relate his history, and to tell by what accident he was forced, or by what motive induced to close his life in the happy villey. As he was going to begin his narrative Rasselas was called to a concert, and obliged to restruin his curiosity till the evening.

THE HISTORY OF IMLAC

THE close of the day is in the regions of the torrid zone, the only season of diversion and entertainment and it was therefore midnight before the musick ceased and the princesses retired. Rasselas then called for his companion, and required him to begin the story of his life.

"Sir, said Imlac my history will not be long the life that is devoted to knowledge passes silently away and is very little diversified by events. To talk in publich, to think in solitude, to read and to hear, to inquire, and answer inquiries is the business of a scholar. He wanders about the world without pomp or terrour, and is neither known nor valued but by men like himself.

"I was born in the kingdom of Gorma, at no great distance from the fount amof the Nile. My father was a wealthy merchant, who traded between the inland countries of Africk and the ports of the Red Sca. He was honest, frugal, and diligent, but of mean sen timents and narrow comprehension. he desired only to be rich, and to conceal his riches, lest he should be spoiled by the governours of the province."

"Surely, said the prince, my father must be negligent of his charge, if any man in his dominions dares take that which belongs to another. Does he not know that kings are accountable for injustice permitted as well as done? If I were emperour, not the meanest of my subjects should be oppressed with impunity. My blood boils when I am told that a merchant durst not enjoy his honest gains for fear of losing them by the rapacity of power. Name the governous who robbed the people, that I may declare his crimes to the emperour."

"Sir, said Imlac, your aidour is the natural effect of virtue animated by youth the time will come when you will acquit your father, and perhaps hear with less impatience of the governour. Oppression is, in the Abissiman dominions, neither frequent nor tolerated, but no form of government has been yet discovered, by which cruelty can be wholly prevented. Subordination supposes power on one part, and subjection on the other, and if power be in the hands of men, it will sometimes be abused. The vigilance of the supreme magistrate may do much, but much will still remain undone. He can never know all the crimes that are committed, and can seldom punish all that he knows."

"This, said the prince, I do not understand, but I had rather hear thee than dispute. Continue thy nairation"

"My father, proceeded Imlac, originally intended that I should have no other education, than such as might qualify me for commerce, and discovering in me great strength of memory, and quickness of apprehension, often declared his hope that that I should be some time the richest man in Abissina

"Why, said the prince, did thy father desire the in crease of his we alth, when it was already are after than he durst discover or enjoy? I am unwilling to doubt thy vericity, yet into not become cannot both be true."

"Inconsistencies answered Indic cannot both be right, but, imputed to min, they may both be true. Yet diversity is not inconsistence. My father might expect a time of greater security. However some desire is necessary to keep life immotion, and he whose real wants are supplied must admit those of fines."

"This, said the prince I can in some men ure conceive. I repent that I interrupted thee" "With this hope, proceeded Imbre, he sent me to school, but when I had once found the delight of knowledge and felt the pleasure of intelligence and the pride of invention, I began silently to despise riches and determined to disappoint the purpole of my father, whose grossess of conception rused my pitt. I was twenty veirs old before his tenderness would expole me to the fittingue of travel, in which time I had been instructed by successive masters in ill the literature of my native country. As every hour taught my something new, I lived in a continual course of gratifications, but as I advanced towards in minoid. I list much of the reverence with which I had been used to look on my instructors because, when the lesson was ended. I did not find them wiser or better than common men.

"At length my father resolved to matrice me in commerce, and opening one of his subterrinean trea suries, counted out ten thousand pieces of gold. This, young man, said he, is the stock with which you must I began with less than the fifth part, and negociate you see how diligence and parsimony have increased This is your own, to waste or to improve you squander it by negligence or caprice, you must wait for my death before you will be rich if, in four years, you double your stock, we will thenceforward let subordination cease, and live together as friends and partners, for he shall always be equal with me, who is equally skilled in the art of growing rich ✓ "We laid our money upon camels, concealed in bales of cheap goods, and travelled to the shore of the Red Sea When I cast my eye on the expanse of waters, my heart bounded like that of a prisoner I felt an unextinguishable curiosity kindle in/my mind, and resolved to snatch this opportunity of seeing the manners of other nations, and of learning sciences unknown in Abissinia

"I remembered that my father had obliged me to the improvement of my stock, not by a promise which I ought not to violate, but by a penalty which I was at liberty to incui, and therefore determined to gratify my predominant desire, and by drinking at the fountains of knowledge, to quench the thirst of curiosity

"As I was supposed to trade without connexion with my father, it was easy for me to become acquainted with the master of a ship, and piocure a passage to some other country. I had no motives of choice to regulate my voyage, it was sufficient for me that wherever I wandered, I should see a country which I had not seen before. I therefore entered a ship bound for Surat, having left a letter for my father declaring my intention."

" WHEN I first entered upon the world of waters and lost sight of hand I looked round about me with pleasing terrour, and thinking my soul enlarged by the boundless prospect, imagined that I could gaze round for ever without satiety, but, in a short time, I grew weary of looking on barren uniformity, where I could only see again what I had already seen then descended into the ship, and doubted for a while whether all my future pleasures would not end like this, in disgust and disappointment \ \text{\text{1}} et, surely, said I, the ocean and the land are very different, the only variety of water is rest and motion, but the earth has mountains and valleys deserts and cities it is inhabited by men of different customs and contrary opinions, and I may hope to find variety in) life though I should miss it in nature

With this thought I quieted my mind, and amused myself during the voyage, sometimes by learning from the sulors the art of navigation which I have never practised, and sometimes by forming schemes for my conduct in different situations, in not one of which I have been ever placed

"I was almost weary of my naval amusements when we landed safely at Surat I secured my money, and purchasing some commodates for show joined myself to a catavan that was passing into the inland country. My companions, for some reason or other, conjecturing that I was rich, and, by my inquiries and admiration, finding that I was ignorant con sidered me as a novice whom they had a right to cheat, and who was to learn, at the usual expense, the art of fraud. They exposed me to the theft of servants, and the exaction of officers, and saw me plundered upon false pretences, without any advantage to themselves, but that of rejoicing in the superiority of their own knowledge."

"Stop a moment, said the prince—Is there such depravity in man, as that he should injure another without benefit to himself? I can easily conceive that all are pleased with superiority—but your ignorance was merely accidental, which being neither your clime nor your folly, could afford them no reason to applicable themselves; and the knowledge which they had, and which you wanted, they might as effectually have shown by waining, as betraying you"

"Pride, said Imlac, is seldom delicate, it will please itself with very mean advantages; and envy feels not its own happiness, but when it may be compared with the misery of others. They were my enemies, because they grieved to think me rich, and my oppressors, because they delighted to find me weak."

"Proceed, said the prince: I doubt not of the facts which you relate, but imagine that you impute them to mistaken motives"

"In this company, said Imlac, I arrived at Agra, the capital of Indostan, the city in which the great Mogul commonly resides. I applied myself to the language of the country, and in a few months was able to converse with the learned men; some of whom I found morose and reserved, and others easy and communicative, some were unwilling to teach another.

another what they had with difficulty learned them selves, and some showed that the end of their studies was to gain the dignity of instructing

'To the tutor of the young princes I recommended myself so much that I was presented to the emperour as a man of uncommon knowledge. The emperour asked me many questions concerning my country and my travels, and though I cannot now recollect any thing that he uttered above the power of a common man, he dismissed me astonished at his wisdom, and enamoured of his goodness.

'My credit was now so high, that the merchants, with whom I had travelled, applied to me for recommendations to the ladies of the Court I was surprised at their confidence of solicitation, and gently reproached them with their practices on the road They heard me with cold indifference, and showed no tokens of shame or sorrow

"They then urged their request with the offer of a bribe but what I would not do for kindness, I would not do for money, and refused them, not because they had injured me but because I would not enable them to injure others, for I knew they would have made use of my credit to cheat those who should buy their wares

"Having resided at Agra till there was no more to be learned, I travelled into Persia, where I saw many remains of ancient magnificence, and observed many new accommodations of life. The Persians are a nation eminently social and their assemblies afforded me duly opportunities of temarking characters and manners, and of tracing human nature through all its variations

"From Persia I passed into Aiabia, where I saw a nation at once pastoral and warlike, who live without any settled habitation, whose only wealth is their flocks and herds, and who have yet carried on, through all ages, an hereditary war with all mankind, though they neither covet nor envy their possessions"

IMLAC'S HISTORY CONTINUED A DISSERTATION UPON POETRY

" WHEREVER I went, I found that poetry was considered as the highest learning, and regarded with a veneration somewhat approaching to that which man would pay to the Angelick Nature And yet it fills me with wonder, that, in almost all countries, the most ancient poets are considered as the best whether it be that every other kind of knowledge is an acquisition gradually attained, and poetry is a gift conferred at once, or that the first poetry of every nation surprised them as a novelty, and retained the credit by consent which it received by accident at first or whether, as the province of poetry is to describe Nature and Passion, which are always the same, the first writers took possession of the most striking objects for description, and the most probable occurnences for fiction, and left nothing to those that followed them, but transcription of the same events, and new combinations of the same images ever be the reason, it is commonly observed that the early writers are in possession of nature, and their followers followers of art that the first excel in strength and invention, and the latter in elegance and refinement.

" I was desirous to add my name to this illustrious fraternity I read all the poet of Persia and Arabia, and was able to repeat by memory the volumes that are suspended in the mosque of Mecca But I soon found that no man was ever great by imitation My desire of excellence impelled me to transfer my attention to nature and to life Nature was to be my subject, and men to be my auditors. I could never describe what I had not seen I could not hope to move those with delight or terrour, whose interests and opinions I did not understand

"Being now resolved to be a Poet, I saw every thing with a new purpose, my sphere of attention was suddenly magnified no kind of knowledge was) to be overlooked. I ranged mountains and deserts for images and resemblances, and pictured upon my mind every tree of the forest and flower of the valley I observed with equal care the erags of the rock and the punnacles of the palace Sometimes I wandered along the mazes of the rivulet and sometimes witched the changes of the summer clouds Fo a poet no thing can be useless Whatever is beautiful, and whatever is dreadful must be familiar to his imagina tion he must be conversant with all that is awfully vast or elegantly little The plants of the garden the animals of the wood, the minerals of the earth, and meteors of the sky, must all concur to store his mind with inexhaustible variety for every idea is useful for the enforcement or decoration of moral or religious_truth, and he, who knows most, will have most power of diversifying his scenes, and of gratifying his reader with remote allusions and unexpected instruction.

"All the appearances of nature I was therefore careful to study, and every country which I have surveyed, has contributed something to my poetical powers."

"In so wide a survey, said the prince, you must surely have left much unobserved. I have lived till now, within the circuit of these mountains, and yet cannot walk abroad without the sight of something which I had never beheld before, or never heeded."

"The business of a poet, said Imlac, is to examine, not the individual, but the species, to remark general properties and large appearances, he does not number the streaks of the tulip, or describe the different shades in the verdure of the forest. He is to exhibit in his portraits of nature such prominent and striking features as recall the original to every mind; and must neglect the minuter discriminations, which one may have remarked, and another have neglected, for those characteristicks which are alike obvious to vigilance and carelesness

"But the knowledge of nature is only half the task of a poet, he must be acquainted likewise with all the modes of life. 'His character requires that he estimate the happiness and misery of every condition; observe the power of all the passions in all their combinations, and trace the changes of the human mind as they are modified by various institutions, and accidental influences, of climate or custom, from the sprightliness of infancy to the despondence of decrepitude. He must divest himself of the prejudices of his age or country, he must consider right and wrong in their abstracted and invariable state—he must dis regard present laws and opinions—and rise to general and transcendental truths—which will always be the same—he must therefore content himself with the slow progress of his name, contemn the applause of his own time, and commit his claims to the justice of posterity—He must write as the interpreter of nature, and the legislator of mankind, and consider himself as presiding over the thoughts and manners of future generations, as a being superiour to time and place

"His labour is not yet at an end he must know many languages and many sciences, and, that his style may be worthy of his thoughts, must, by in cessant practice familianze to himself every delicacy of speech and grace of harmony"

IMLACS NARRATIVE CONTINUED A HINT ON PILGRIMAGE

IMLAC now felt the enthusinstick fit, and was proceeding to aggrandize his own profession, when the prince cried out, "Enough! thou has convinced me that no human being can ever be a poet Proceed with thy narration"

'To be a poet, said Imlac, is indeed very difficult. 'So difficult, returned the prince, that I will at present hear no more of his labours. Tell me whither you went when you had seen Persia.

From Persia, said the poet, I travelled through Syria, and for three years resided in Palestine, where I conversed with great numbers of the northern and western nations of Europe, the nations which are now in possession of all power and all knowledge, whose armies are mesistible, and whose fleets command the remotest parts of the globe. When I compared these men with the natives of our own kingdom, and those that surround us, they appeared almost another order of beings. In their countries it is difficult to wish for any thing that may not be obtained a thousand arts, of which we never heard, are continually labouring for their convenience and pleasure, and whatever their own climate has denied them is supplied by their commerce."

"By what means, said the prince, are the Europeans thus powerful, or why, since they can so easily visit Asia and Africa for trade or conquest, cannot the Asiaticks and Africans invade their coasts, plant colonies in their ports, and give laws to their natural princes? The same wind that carries them back would bring us thither"

They are more powerful, Sn, than we, answered Imlac, because they are wiser, knowledge will always predominate over ignorance, as man governs the other animals. But why then knowledge is more than ours, I know not what reason can be given, but the unsearchable will of the Supreme Being."

"When, said the prince with a sigh, shall I be able to visit Palestine, and mingle with this mighty confluence of nations? Till that happy moment shall arrive, let me fill up the time with such representations as thou caust give me I am not ignorant of the motive that assembles such numbers in that place, and cannot but consider it as the centre of wisdom and piety, to which the best and wisest men of every land must be continually resorting

"There are some nations, said Imlac, that send few visitants to Palestine for many numerous and learned sects in Europe concur to censure pilgrimage as superstitious or deride it as ridiculous

'Î ou I now sud the prince how little my life has made me acquainted with diversity of opinions it will be too long to hear the arguments on both sides you, that have considered them, tell me the result

Pilgrimage said Imlac, lil e many other acts of picty, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed Long journeys in search of truth_are_not_commanded Truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life. is always found where it is honestly sought Change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind - Yet, since men go every day to view the fields where preat actions have been performed and return with stronger impressions of the event curiosity of the same kind may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning, and I believe no man surveys those awful scenes without some confirmation of holy resolutions That the Supreme Being may be more easily propitiated in one place than in mother, is the dream of idle superstition, but that some places may operate upon upon our own minds in an uncommon manner, is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine, will, perhaps, find himself mistaken, yet he may go thither without folly he who thinks they will be more freely pardoned, dishonours at once his reason and religion."

"These, said the prince, are European distinctions I will consider them another time have you found to be the effect of knowledge? Are those nations happier than we?"

"There is so much infelicity, said the poet, in the world, that scarce any man has lessure from his own distresses to estimate the comparative happiness of others Knowledge is certainly one of the means of pleasure, as is confessed by the natural desire which every mind feels of increasing its ideas. Ignorance is mere privation, by which nothing can be produced it is a vacuity in which the soul sits motionless and torpid for vant of attraction, and without knowing why, we always rejoice when we learn, and grieve when we forget. I am therefore inclined to conclude, that if nothing counteracts the natural consequence of learning, we grow more happy as our minds take a wider range

"In enumerating the particular comforts of life, we shall find many advantages on the side of the Europeans _ They cure wounds and diseases with which we languish and perish We suffer inclemencies of weather which they can obviate They have engines for the dispatch of many laborious works, which we must perform by manual industry. There is such communication between distant places, that one friend can hardly be said to be absent from another. Their policy removes all publick inconveniencies they have roads cut through their mountains, and bridges laid upon their rivers. And, if we descend to the privacies of life, their habitations are more commodious and their possessions are more secure."

"They are surely happy, said the prince who have all these conveniences of which I entry none so much as the facility with which separated friends

interchange then thoughts

'The Europeans answered Imlac are less un happy than we but they are not happy Human life is every where a state in which much is to be endured, and little to be enjoyed

"I AM not yet willing sud the prince, to suppose that happiness is so parsimoniously distributed to mortals nor can believe but that if I had the choice of life I should be able to fill every day with pleasure. I would injure no man and should provoke no resentment. I would relieve every distress and should enjoy the benedictions of gratitude. I would chuse my friends among the wise, and my wife among the virtuous and therefore should be in no danger from treachery or unkindness. My children should, by my care, be learned and pious. Vot. III. Z.

and would repay to my age what their childhood had received. What would dare to molest him who might call on every side to thousands enriched by his bounty, or assisted by his power? And why should not life glide quietly away in the soft reciprocation of protection and reverence? All this may be done without the help of European refinements, which appear by their effects to be rather specious than useful. Let us leave them, and pursue our journey."

"From Palestine, said Imlac, I passed through many regions of Asia; in the more civilized kingdoms as a trader, and among the barbarians of the mountains as a pilgrim. At last I began to long for my native country, that I might repose after my travels and fatigues, in the places where I had spent my earliest years, and gladden my old companions with the recital of my adventures. Often did I figure to myself those with whom I had sported away the gay hours of dawning life, sitting round me in its evening, wondering at my tales, and listening to my counsels

"When this thought had taken possession of my mind, I considered every moment as wasted which did not bring me nearer to Abissima. I hastened into Egypt, and notwithstanding my impatience, was detained ten months in the contemplation of its ancient magnificence, and in inquiries after the remains of its ancient learning. I found in Cano a mixture of all nations, some brought thither by the love of knowledge, some by the hope of gain, and many by the desire of living after their own manner without observation, and of lying hid in the obscurity of multitudes.

titudes, for in a city, populous as Carro, it is possible to obtain at the same time the gratifications of society, and the secrecy of solitude

" From Culo I travelled to Suez, and emburked on the Red Ser passing along the coast till I arrived at the poit from which I had departed twenty years before Heie I joined myself to a caravan, and re entered my native country

I now expected the caresses of my kinsmen, and the congratulations of my friends and was not without hope that my fither, whatever value he had set upon riches, would own with gladness and pride a son who was able to add to the felicity and honour of the nation. But I was soon convinced that my thoughts were vain. My father had been dead four teen years, having divided his wealth among my brothers, who were removed to some other provinces. Of my companions, the greater part was in the grave of the real to some could with difficulty remember me, and some considered me as one corrupted by foreign manners.

A man used to vicissitudes is not easily dejected. I forgot after a time my disappointment and endea voured to recommend myself to the nobles of the king dom, they admitted me to their tables, heard my story and dismissed me. I opened a school and was prohibited to teach. I then resolved to sit down in the quiet of domestick life, and addressed a lady that was fond of my conversation, but rejected my suit because my father was a merchant.

Werried at last with solicitation and repulses I resolved to hide myself for ever from the world and depend no longer on the opinion or caprice of their others I waited for the time when the gate of the happy valley should open, that I might bid farewell to hope and fear the day came; my performance was distinguished with favour, and I resigned myself with joy to perpetual confinement"

"Hast thou here found happiness at last? said Rasselas Tell me without reserve, art thou content with thy condition? or, dost thou wish to be again wandering and inquiring? All the inhabitants of this valley celebrate their lot, and at the annual visit of the emperour, invite others to partake of their felicity."

"Great prince, said Imlac, I shall speak the truth; I know not one of all your attendants who does not lament the hour when he entered this retreat. I am less unhappy than the rest, because I have a mind replete with images, which I can vary and combine at pleasure—I can amuse my solitude by the renovation of the knowledge which begins to fade from my memory, and by recollection of the accidents of my past life. Yet all this ends in the sorrowful consideration, that my acquirements are now useless, and that none of my pleasures can be again enjoyed. The rest, whose minds have no impression but of the present moment, are either corroded by malignant passions, or sit stupid in the gloom of perpetual vacancy"

"What passions can infest those, said the prince, who have no rivals? We are in a place where impotence precludes malice, and where all envy is repressed by community of enjoyments."

"There may be community, said Imlac, of material possessions, but there can never be community of love or of esteem. It must happen that one will

please more than another he that knows himself despised will always be envious, and still more envious and malevolent, if he is condemned to live in the presence of those who despise him. The in virtuous, by which they allure others to a state which they feel to be wretched, proceed from the natural malignity of hopeless misery. They are weary of themselves and of each other, and expect to find relief in new companions. They envy the liberty which their folly has forfated, and would gladly see all mankind imprisoned like themselves.

" From this crime, however, I am wholly free No man can say that he is wretched by my persuasion. I look with pity on the crowds who are annually soliciting admission to captivity, and wish that it were lawful for me to wirn them of their danger."

- "My dear Imbe said the prince I will open to thee my whole heart. I have long meditated an escape from the happy valley. I have examined the mountains on every side, but find my self insuperably barred teach me the wij to break my prison, thou shalt be the companion of my flight, the guide of my rambles the partner of my fortune, and my sole director in the choice of life."

"Sir, answered the poet, your escape will be difficult, and, perhaps, you may soon repent your curosity. The world, which you figure to yourself smooth and quiet as the lake in the valley, you will find a sea forming with tempests, and boiling with whillpools, you will be sometimes overwhelmed by the waves of violence, and sometimes dashed against the rocks of treachery—Amidst wrongs and frauds, competitions and anxieties, you will wish a thousand times for these seats of quiet, and willingly quit hope to be free from fear "

- "Do not seek to deter me from my purpose, said the prince. I am impatient to see what thou hast seen, and, since thou art thyself weary of the valley, it is evident, that thy former state was better than this. Whatever be the consequence of my coperiment, I am resolved to judge, with mine own eyes, of the various conditions of men, and then to make deliberately my choice of life."
- "I am afiaid, said Imlac, you are hindered by stronger restraints than my persuasions, yet, if your determination is fixed, I do not counsel you to despair. Few things are impossible to diligence and skill."

RASSELAS DISCOVERS THE MLANS OF ISCAPE

THE prince now dismissed his favourite to rest, but the narrative of wonders and novelties filled his mind with perturbation. He revolved all that he had heard, and prepared innumerable questions for the morning

Much of his uneasiness was now removed. He had a friend to whom he could impart his thoughts, and whose experience could assist him in his designs. His heart was no longer condemned to swell with silent vexation. He thought that even the happy valley might be endured with such a companion, and that if they could range the world together, he should have nothing further to desire

In a few days the water was discharged, and the ground dried The prince and Imlac then walked out together to converse without the notice of the The prince, whose thoughts were always on the wing, as he passed by the gate said, with a countenance of sorrow "Why art thou so strong, and why is man so weak

"Man is not weak, answered his companion, knowledge is more than equivalent to force master of mechanicks laughs at strength burst the gate, but cannot do it secretly Some other expedient must be tried '

As they were walking on the side of the mountain, they observed that the comes, which the rain had driven from their burrows, had taken shelter among the bushes and formed holes behind them, tending upwards in an oblique line "It has been the opi mon of antiquity, said Imlac, that human reason borrowed many arts from the instinct of animals let us therefore not think ourselves degraded by learning from the cony We may escape by piercing the mountain in the same direction We will begin where the summit hangs over the middle part and labour upward till we shall issue up beyond the prominence,

The eyes of the prince, when he heard this pro posal spirkled with joy. The c ecution was easy and the success certain brambles, and returned without having discovered any part that favoured their design. The second and the third day were speat in the same manner and with the same frustration. But, on the fourth, they found a small cavern, concealed by a thicket, where they resolved to make their experiment.

Imlac procured instruments proper to hew stone and remove carth, and they fell to their work on the next day with more eagerness than vigour. They were presently exhausted by their efforts, and sat down to pant upon the grass The prince, for a moment, appeared to be discouraged. "Sir, said his companion, practice will enable us to continue our labout for a longer time, mark, however, how far we have advanced, and you will find that our toil will sometime have an end Great works are performed, not by strength, but perseverance: yonder palace was raised by single stones, yet you see its height and spaciousness. He that shall walk with vigour three hours a day, will pass in seven years a space equal to the circumference of the globe"

They returned to their work day after day, and, in a short time, found a fissure in the rock, which enabled them to pass far with very little obstruction. This Rasselas considered as a good omen "Do not disturb your mind, said Imlac, with other hopes or fears than reason may suggest, if you are pleased with prognosticks of good, you will be terrified likewise with tokens of evil, and your whole life will be a prey to superstition. Whatever facilitates our work is more than an omen, it is a cause of success. This is one of those pleasing surprises which often happen.

happen to active resolution _Many things difficult to design prove casy to performance"

RASSEI AND IMLAG RECLIVE AN UNEXPECTED VISIT

They had now wrought their way to the middle and solaced then toil with the approach of liberty, when the prince coming down to refiesh himself with air found his sister. Nekayah studing before the mouth of the cavity. He started and stood confused, afraid to tell his design, and yet hopcless to conceal it. A few moments determined him to repole on her fidelity, and secure her secrecy by a declaration without reserve.

" Do not imagine, said the princess that I came hither as a spy I had long observed from my window, that you and Imlac directed your walk every day towards the same point, but I did not suppose you had any better reason for the preference than a cooler shade, or more fragrant bank, nor followed you with any other design than to pairalle of your conversation Since then not suspicion but fondness has detected you, let me not lose the advantuse of my discovery. I am equally a cary of confinement with yourself, and not less desirous of knowing what is done or suffered in the world Permit me to fly with you from this tasteless tranquillity, which will yet grow more lorth ome when you have left me You may denv me to accompany you, but cannot hinder me from following'

The prince, who loved Nekayah above his other sisters, had no inclination to refuse her request, and grieved that he had lost an opportunity of showing his confidence by a voluntary communication. It was therefore agreed that she should leave the valley with them, and that, in the mean time, she should watch, lest any other straggler should, by chance or currosity, follow them to the mountain

At length their labour was at an end, they saw light beyond the prominence, and, issuing to the top of the mountain, beheld the Nile, yet a narrow current, wandering beneath them

The prince looked round with rapture, anticipated all the pleasures of travel, and in thought was already transported beyond his father's dominions. Imlac, though very joyful at his escape, had less expectation of pleasure in the world, which he had before tried, and of which he had been weary.

Rasselas was so much delighted with a wider horizon, that he could not soon be persuaded to return into the valley. He informed his sister that the way was open, and that nothing now remained but to prepare for their departure.

CHAP XV

AND SEE MANY WONDERS

THE prince and princess had jewels sufficient to make them rich whenever they came into a place of commerce, which, by Imlac's direction, they hid in their clothes, and, on the night of the next full moon, all

all left the valler The princess was followed only by a single favourite, who did not I now whither she was soing

They clambered through the crusty, and began to go down on the other sid. The pancess and her maid turned them eves towards every part, and, seeing nothing to bound their prospect, considered themselves as in danger of being lost in a dreary vacuity. They stopped and trembled 'I amailmost afraid, said the princess to begin a journey of which I cannot perceive an end and to venture into this immense plans, where I may be approached on every side by men whom I never saw. The prince felt nearly the same emotions, though he thought it more manly to concerd them.

Imbe smiled at their terrours and encouraged them to proceed, but the princess continued irreso lute till she had been imperceptibly drawn forward too far to return

In the morning they found some shepherds in the field, who set milk and fruits before them. The princess wondered that she did not see a polace ready for her reception and a table spread with de liceness, but being fruit and thought them of a higher flavour than the produce of the valley.

They travelled forward by easy journeys, being all unnecusto ned to toil or difficulty, and knowing that though they might be mised, they could not be pursued. In a few days, they came into a more a populous region, where Imlie was diverted with the admiration which his companions expressed at the diversity of manners, stations, and employments.

Their diess was such as might not bring upon them the suspicion of having any thing to conceal, yet the prince, wherever he came, expected to be obeyed, and the princess was frightened, because those that came into her presence did not prostrate themselves before her Imlac was forced to observe them with great rigilance, lest they should betray their rank by their unusual behaviour, and detained them several weeks in the first village, to accustom them to the sight of common mortals

By degrees the loyal wanderers were taught to understand that they had for a time laid aside their dignity, and were to expect only such regard as liberality and courtesy could procure. And Imlac having, by many admonitions, prepared them to endure the tumults of a port, and the ruggedness of the commercial race, brought them down to the sea-coast.

The prince and his sister, to whom every thing was new, were gratified equally at all places, and therefore remained for some months at the port without any inclination to pass further. Imlac was content with their stay, because he did not think it safe to expose them, unpractised in the world, to the hazards of a foreign country.

At last he began to fear lest they should be discovered, and proposed to fix a day for their departure. They had no pretensions to judge for themselves, and referred the whole scheme to his direction. He therefore took passage in a ship to Suez, and, when the time came, with great difficulty prevailed on the princess to enter the vessel. They had a quick and prosperous voyage, and from Suez travelled by land to Cairo.

THEY ENTER CAIRO, AND FIND EVERY MAY

As they approached the city, which filled the strangers with astonishment, This, and Imlac to the prince, is the place where travellers and merchants as emble from all the corners of the earth. You will here find men of every character, and every occupation. Commerce is here honourable. I will act as a merchant, and you shall live as strangers, who have no other end of travel than curiosity, it will soon be observed that we are rich, our reputation will procure us access to all whom we shall desire to know, you will see all the conditions of humanity and enable yourself at leisure to make your choice of life.

They now entered the town, stunned by the noise, and offended by the crowds. Instruction had not yet so prevailed over habit, but that they wondered to see themselves pass undistinguished along the street and met by the lowest of the people without reverence or notice. The princess could not at first bear the thought of being levelled with the vulgar, and for some days continued in her chember where she was served by her favourite Pekuah as in the palace of the valley.

Imlac who understood trafficl sold part of the jewels the next day, and hared a house, which he adorned with such in ignificence, that he was immediately considered as a merchant of great wealth

His politeness attracted many acquaintance, and his generosity made him courted by many dependants. His table was crowded by men of every nation, who all admired his knowledge, and solicited his favour. His companions, not being able to mix in the conversation, could make no discovery of their ignorance or surprise, and were gradually initiated in the world as they gained knowledge of the language

The prince had, by frequent lectures, been taught the use and nature of money, but the ladies could not, for a long time, comprehend what the merchants did with small pieces of gold and silver, or why things of so little use should be received as equivalent to the necessaries of life

They studied the language two years, while Imlac was preparing to set before them the various ranks and conditions of mankind. He grew acquainted with all who had any thing uncommon in their fortune or conduct. He frequented the voluptuous and the frugal, the idle and the busy, the merchants and the men of learning.

The plance being now able to converse with fluency, and having learned the caution necessary to be observed in his intercourse with strangers, began to accompany Imlac to places of resort, and to enter into all assemblies, that he might make his choice of life

For some time he thought choice needless, because all appeared to him equally happy. Wherever he went he met gayety and kindness, and heard the song of joy or the laugh of carelesness. He began to believe that the world overflowed with universal plenty, and that nothing was withheld either from want or ment, that every hand showered liberality, and every heart melted with benevolence, "and who then says he, will be suffered to be wretched?"

Imlae permitted the pleasing delusion, and was unwilling to crush the hope of mexperience, till one day having sat awhile silent, "I know not, said the prince, what can be the teason that I am more unhappy than any of our friends. I see them perpetually and unditerably cheerful, but feel my own mind restless and uneasy. I am unsatisfied with those pleasures which I seem most to court. I live in the crowds of jollity, not so much to enjoy company, as to shun my self, and amonly loud and merry to conceal my sadness."

"Every man, said Imlac may by examining his own mind, guess what pases in the minds of others when you feel that your own greety is counterfeit it may justly lead you to suspect that of your companions not to be sincere. Ency is commonly reciprocal. We are long before we are convinced that thappiness is never to be found and each believes it possessed by others to keep alive the hope of obtaining it for himself. In the assembly, where you passed the last night, there appeared such spright liness of air, and volatility of fancy, is might have suited beings of an higher order, formed to inhight scrence regions inaccessible to care or sorrow, yet believe me prince, there was not one who did not dread the moment, when solitude should deliver him to the tyrunny of reflection.

This said the prince, may be true of others since it is true of me, yet whatever be the general infelicity of man, one condition is more happy than another.

another, and wisdom surely directs us to take the least evil in the choice of life"

- "The causes of good and evil, answered Imlac, are so various and uncertain, so often entangled with each other, so diversified by various relations, and so much subject to accidents which cannot be foreseen, that he who would fix his condition upon incontestible reasons of preference, must live and die inquiring and deliberating"
- "But surely, said Rasselas, the wise men, to whom we listen with reverence and wonder, chose that mode of life for themselves which they thought most likely to make them happy."
- man is placed in his present condition by causes which acted without his foresight, and with which he did not always willingly co-operate, and therefore you will raiely meet one who does not think the lot of his neighbour better than his own"
 - "I am pleased to think, said the prince, that my birth has given me at least one advantage over others, by enabling me to determine for myself. I have here the world before me, I will review it at leisure: surely happiness is somewhere to be found."

THE PRINCE ASSOCIATES WITH YOUNG MEN OF SPIRIT AND GAYETY.

RASSELAS rose next day, and resolved to begin his experiments upon life "Youth, cried he, is the time of gladness: I will join myself to the young men, whose

v hose only business is to gratify their desires, and whose time is all spent in a succession of enjoyments."

To such societies he was readily admitted, but a few days brought him back weary and disgusted. Their mirth was without images, their laughter without motive, their pleasures were gios and sensual, in which the mind had no part, their conduct was at once wild and mean, they laughed at order and at law, but the frown of power dejected, and the eye of wisdom abashed them.

The prince soon concluded that he should never be happy in a course of life of which he was ashamed. He thought it unsuitable to a reasonable being to act without a plan and to be said or cheerful only by chance. "Happiness, said he, must be something solid and permanent, without fear and without uncertainty."

But his young companions had gained so much of his regard by their frankness and courtest, that he could not leave them without warning and re " My friends said he, I have seriously monstrance considered our manners and our prospects, and find that we have mistaken our own interest. The first years of man must make provision for the last He that never thinks never can be wise Pernetual levity must end in ignorance and intemperance, though it may fire the spirits for an hour, will make life short or imserable Let us consider that youth is of no long duration, and that in maturer age, when the enchantments of fancy shall cease, and phantoms of delight dance no more about us we shall have no comforts but the esteem of wise men, and the means of doing good Let us, therefore, Vor. III AΑ stop.

stop, while to stop is in our power: let us, live as, men who are sometime to grow old, and to whom it will be the most dreadful of all evils to count their past years by follies, and to be reminded of their former luxuriance of health only by the maladies which riot has produced."

They stated a while in silence one upon another, and at last, drove him away by a general choius of continued laughter.

The consciousness that his sentiments, were just, and his intentions kind, was scarcely sufficient to support him against the horiour of derision. But he recovered his tranquillity, and pursued his search.

CHAP. XVIII.

THE PRINCE FINDS A WISE AND HAPPY MAN.

As he was one day walking in the street, he saw a spacious building, which all were, by the open doors, invited to enter. he followed the stream of people, and found it a hall or school of declamation, in which professors read lectures to their auditory. He fixed his eye upon a sage raised above the rest, who discoursed with great energy on the government of the passions. His look was venerable, his action graceful, his pronunciation clear, and his diction elegant. He showed, with great strength of sentiment, and variety of illustration, that human nature is degraded and debased, when the lower faculties predominate over the higher, that when fancy, the parent of passion, usurps the dominion of the

the mind, nothing ensues but the natural effect of unlawful government, perturbation and confusion. that she betrays the fortresses of the intellect to rebels, and excites her children to sedition against reason, their lawful sovereign He compared reason to the sun of which the light is constant, uniform, and lasting, and fancy to a meteor of bright but transitory lustre, irregular in its motion, and delusivei in its directions

He then communicated the various precepts given from time to time for the conquest of passion, and displayed the happiness of those who had obtained the important victory after which man is no longer the slave of fear, nor the fool of hope- is no more emacrated by enty, inflained by anger, ema culated, by tenderness, or depressed by grief, but walks on colmly through the tumults or privacies of life, as the sun pursues abkethis course through the calm or the stormy sky

He enumerated many examples of heroes im movable by p up or pleasure who looked with indifference on those modes or accidents to a high the sulgargise the names of good and evil. He exhorted his hearets to lay uside their prejudices, and arm themselves against; the shafts of malice or misfortune by invulnerable patience concluding that this state only was happiness and that this happiness was in every one's power

Rasselas listened to him with the veneration due to the instructions of a superiour being and waiting for him at the door, humbly implored the liberty of visiting so great a master of true wisdom lecturer hesitated a moment, when Rasselas put a purse A A 2

"I have found, said the prince, at his return to Imlac, a man who can teach all that is necessary to be known, who, from the unshaken throne of rational fortitude, looks down on the scenes of life changing beneath him. He speaks, and attention watches his lips. He reasons, and conviction closes his periods. This man shall be my future guide: I will learn his doctrines, and imitate his life."

"Be not too hasty, said Imlac, to trust, or to admire the teachers of morality: they discourse like angels, but they live like men"

Rasselas, who could not conceive how any man could reason so forcibly without feeling the cogency of his own arguments, paid his visit in a few days, and was denied admission. He had now learned the power of money, and made his way by a piece of gold to the inner apartment, where he found the philosopher in a room half darkened, with his eyes misty, and his face pale. "Sir, said he, you are come at a time when all human friendship is useless; what I suffer cannot be remedied, what I have lost cannot be supplied. My daughter, my only daughter, from whose tenderness I expected all the comforts of my age, died last night of a fever. My views, my purposes, my hopes are at an end. I am now a lonely being disunited from society."

"Sir, said the prince, mortality is an event by which a wise man can never be surprised: we know that death is always near, and it should therefore always be expected." "Young man, answered the philosopher, you speak like one that has never felt

the pungs of separation" "Have you then forgot the precepts said Rassel is, which you so powerfully enforced? Has wisdom no strength to arm the heart against calamity? Consider, that external things are naturally variable, but truth and reason are always the same "What comfort said the mourance, cur truth and reason afford me? of what effect are they now, but to tell me, that my daughter will not be restored?"

The prince, whose humanity would not suffer him to insult misery with reproof went away convinced of the emptiness of rhetorical sound, and the inefficacy of polished periods and studied sentences

A GLIMPSE OF PASTORAL LIFE

He was still eager upon the same inquiry and having heard of a hermit, that have near the lowest cataract of the Nile, and filled the whole country with the fame of his sanctity, resolved to visit his retreat, and inquire whether that feherly which publich his could not afford, was to be found in solitude, and whether a man whose age and virtue made him venerable, could teach any peculiar art of shunning evils, or enduring them

Imhe and the princess agreed to accompany him, and, after the necessary preparations, they begin their journey. Their way by through the fields, where shepherds tended their flocks, and the lambs were playing upon the pasture. "This said the poet, is the life which has been often celebrated for its innocence and quiet, let us pars the heat of the day among the shepherds tents, and know whether all our searches are not to terminate in pastoral simplicity."

The proposal pleased them, and they induced the shepherds, by small presents and familiar questions, to tell their opinion of their own state, they were so rude and ignorant, so little able to compare the good with the evil of the occupation, and so indistinct in their narratives and descriptions, that very little could be learned from them. But it was evident that their hearts were eightered with discontent, that they considered themselves as condemined to labour for the luxury of the rich, and looked up with stupid malevolence toward those that were placed above them

The princess pronounced with vehemence, that she would never suffer these envious savages to be her companions, and that she should not soon be desnous of seeing any more specimens of rustick happiness, but could not believe that all the accounts of primeval pleasures were fabulous; and was yet in doubt, whether life had any thing that could be justly preferred to the placid gratifications of fields and woods. She hoped that the time would come, when, with a few virtuous and elegant companions, she should gather flowers planted by her own hand, fondle the lambs of her own ewe, and listen, without care, among brooks and breezes, to one of her maidens reading in the shade

THE DANCER OF TROSPERITS

Os the next day they continued their journey, till the heat compelled them to look round for shelter At a small distance they saw a thick wood, which they no sooner entered than they perceived that they were approaching the habitations of men shrubs were diligently cut may to open walks where the shades were darkest, the boughs of opposite trees were artificially interwoven, seits of flowery turf were rused in vacant spaces, and a rivulet, that wantoned along the side of a winding path, had its bruks sometimes opened into small brains, and its streams sometimes obstructed by little mounds of stone, he ned together to mere see its marmurs

They passed slowly through the wood, delighted with such unexpected accommodations, and entertuned each other with conjecturing what, or who, he could be, that in those rude and unfrequented regions, had leisure and art for such harmless luxury

As they advanced they heard the sound of musick, and say vouths and virgins during in the grove, and, going still further, beheld a stately palace built upon a full surrounded with woods. The laws of eastern hospitality allowed them to enter, and the master velcomed them like a man liberal and wealthy

He was skilful enough in appearances soon to dis cern that they were no common guests, and spread his table with magnificence. The cloquence of Imlao caught his attention, and the lofty courtesy of the princess excited his respect. When they offered to depart he entreated their stay, and was the next day still more unwilling to dismiss them than before. They were easily persuaded to stop, and civility grew up in time to fleedom and confidence.

The prince now saw all the domesticks cheerful, and all the face of nature smiling round the place, and could not forbear to hope that he should find here what he was seeking, but when he was congratulating the master upon his possessions, he answered with a sigh, "My condition has indeed the appearance of happiness, but appearances are delusive My prosperity puts my life in danger, the Bassa of Egypt is my enemy, incensed only by my wealth and popularity I have been hitherto protected against him by the princes of the country, but, as the favour of the great is uncertain, I know not how soon my defenders may be persuaded to share the plunder with the Bassa I have sent my treasures into a distant country, and, upon the first alarm, am prepared to follow them Then will my enemies riot in my mansion, and enjoy the gaidens which I have planted"

They all joined in lamenting his danger, and deprecating his exile—and the princess was so much disturbed with the tumult of grief and indignation, that she retired to her apartment—They continued with their kind inviter a few days longer, and then went forward to find the hermit.

THE HAPPINESS OF SOLITUDE THE HERMITS

They came on the third day, by the direction of the persents, to the hermit's cell it was a cavern in the side of a mountain, over shadowed vith palm trees, at such a distance from the cataract that nothing more was heard than a gentle uniform murmur, such as composed the mind to pensive meditation especially when it was assisted by the wind whistling among the brunches. The first rude essay of nature had been so much improved by human labour, that the encontained several apartments appropriated to different uses and often afforded lodging to trivellers, whom darkness or tem pests happened to opertake.

The hermit set on a bench at the door, to enjoy the coolness of the evening. On one side by a book with pens and papers, on the other mechanical instruments of various kinds. As they approached him unregarded, the princess observed that he had not the countenance of a man that had found, or could teach the way to happiness.

They saluted him with great respect, which he repaid like a man not unaccustomed to the forms of courts. "My children, said he if you have lost your way, you shall be willingly supplied with such conveniencies for the night is this cavern will afford. I have all that nature requires, and you will not expect delicates in a hermit's cell."

They

They thanked him, and, entering, were pleased with the neatness and regularity of the place. The hermit set flesh and wine before them, though he fed only upon fruits and water. His discourse was cheerful without levity, and pious without enthusiasm. He soon gained the esteem of his guests, and the princess reperted of her hasty censure.

At last Imlac began thus "I do not now wonder that your reputation is so far extended; we have heard at Cano of your wisdom, and came hither to implore your direction for this young man and maiden in the choice of life"

"To him that lives well, answered the hermit, every form of life is good, not can I give any other rule for choice, than to remove from all apparent evil"

"He will remove most certainly from evil, said the prince, who shall devote himself to that solitude which you have recommended by you example"

" I have indeed lived fifteen years in solitude, said the hermit, but have no desire that my example should gain any imitators In my youth I professed aims, and was raised by degrees to the highest mili-I have traversed wide countries at the tary rank head of my troops, and seen many battles and sieges At last, being disgusted by the picferments of a younger officer, and feeling that my vigour was beginning to decay, I was resolved to close my life in peace, having found the world full of snares, discord, and misery I had once escaped from the pursuit of the enemy by the shelter of this cavein, and therefore chose it for my final residence I employed artificers to form it into chambers, and stored it with all that I was likely to want.

" For some time after my retreat, I rejoiced like a tempest beaten sulor at his entrance into the harbour, being delighted with the sudden change of the noise and hurry of war to stillness and repose When the pleasure of novelty went way, I employed my hours in examining the plants which grow in the valley, and the numerals which I collected from the But that inquiry is now grown tasteless and I have been for some time unsettled and distracted my mind is disturbed with a thousand perplexities of doubt, and vanities of imagination, which hourly prevail upon me because I have no opportunities of relayition or diversion. I am some times ashamed to think that I could not secure my self from vice, but by retiring from the exercise of virtue, and begin to suspect that I was rather impelled by resentment, than led by devotion, into solitude My funcy riots in scenes of folly, and I Inment that I have lost o much, and have gained so little In solitude, if I escape the example of bad men I vant likewi e the counsel and conversation of the good I have been long comparing the early with the advantages of society, and resolve to return into the world to morrow The life of a solit my man will be certainly mi erable but not certainly devout"

They heard his resolution with surprise but after a short pause, offered to conduct him to Cairo. He dug up a considerable treasure which he had hid among the rocks, and accompanied them to the city, on which, as he approached it, he gazed with rapture

THE HAPPINESS OF A LIFE LED ACCORDING TO NATURE

RASSELAS went often to an assembly of learned men, who met at stated times to unbend their minds, and compare their opinions. Their manners were somewhat coarse, but their conversation was instructive, and their disputations acute, though sometimes too violent, and often continued till neither controvertist remembered upon what question they began. Some faults were almost general among them. every one was desirous to dictate to the rest, and every one was pleased to hear the genius or knowledge of another depreciated

In this assembly Rasselas was relating his interview with the hermit, and the wonder with which he heard him censure a course of life which he had so deliberately chosen and so laudably followed. The sentiments of the hearers were various. Some were of opinion, that the folly of his choice had been justly punished by condemnation to perpetual perseverance. One of the youngest among them, with great vehemence, pronounced him an hypocrite. Some talked of the right of society to the labour of individuals, and considered retirement as a descrition of duty. Others readily allowed, that there was a time when the claims of the publick were satisfied, and when a man might properly sequester himself, to review his life, and purify his heart would, in a few years go back to his retreat and, perhips, if shame did not restrain or death intercept him return once more from his retreat into the world "For the hope of happiness said he is so strongly impressed that the longest experience is not able to effice it. Of the present state, whatever it be, we feel, and are forced to confess the misery yet, when the same state is again at a distance imagination paints it as desirable. But the time will surely come, when desire will be no longer our torment, and no man shall be wretched but by his own full.

" This said a philosopher who had heard him with tokens of great impatience is the present condition of a wise man The time is already come. when none are wretched but by their own fullt Nothing is more idle, than to inquire after happiness, which nature has kindly placed within our reach The way to be happy is to live according to nature in obedience to that universal and unalterable lay with which every heart is originally impressed which is not written on it by precept but engraven by destiny not instilled by education, but infused at our He that lives according to nature will suffer nothing from the delusions of hope or importunities of desire he will receive and reject with equability of temper and act or suffer as the reason of things shall alterna ely prescribe Other men may amuse themselves with subtle definitions, or intricate Let them learn to be wise by casier means Jet them observe the hand of the forest and the linnet of the grove let them consider the life of annuals, whose motions are regulated by instinct, v they obey their guide and are happy. Let us therefore, at length, cease to dispute, and learn to live, throw away the incumbrance of precepts, which they who utter them with so much pride and pomp do not understand, and carry with us this simple and intelligible maxim, That deviation from nature is deviation from happiness"

When he had spoken, he looked round him with a placid an, and enjoyed the consciousness of his own beneficence. "Sir, said the prince, with great modesty, as I, like all the rest of markind, am desirous of felicity, my closest attention has been fixed upon your discourse. I doubt not the truth of a position which a man so learned has so confidently advanced. Let me only know what it is to live according to nature"

"When I find young men so humble and so docile, said the philosopher, I can deny them no information which my studies have enabled me to afford To live according to nature, is to act always with due regard to the fitness arising from the relations and qualities of causes and effects, to concur with the great and unchangeable scheme of universal felicity, to co-operate with the general disposition and tendency of the present system of things".

The prince soon found that this was one of the sages, whom he should understand less as he heard him longer. He therefore bowed and was silent, and the philosopher, supposing him satisfied, and the rest vanquished, rose up and departed with the air of a man that, had co-operated with the present system.

THE PRINCE AND HIS SISTER, DIVIDE BETWEEN THEM THE WOFE, OF OBSERVATION

RASSFL is returned home-full of reflections, doubtfull how to direct his future steps. Of the way, to hap piness he found the learned and simple equally ignorant but, as he was yet young, he flattered himself that he had time remaining for more experiments and further inquiries. He communicated to Imlac his observations and his doubts but was answered by him with new doubts and remarks that give him no comfort. He therefore discoursed more frequently and freely with his sister, who had yet the same hope, with himself and always assisted him to give some reason why though he had been hitherto frustrated he might succeed at last

We have hitherto, sud, she known but little of the world we have never yet been either great or mem. In our own country, though, we had no power, and in this we have not yet, seen the private recesses of domestick peace. Imlac, find yours not our search, lest we should in time find him; shall try what is to be found in the splendour of courts, and I will ringe the shades of humbler life. Perhaps command and authority may be the supremental blessings, as they afford most opportunities of doing; good or perhaps what this world can give may be found in the modest habitations of middle fortune it too low for great designs, and too high for penury and distress.

THE PRINCE EXAMINES THE HAPPINESS OF HIGH STATIONS.

RASSELAS applauded the design, and appeared next day with a splendid retinue at the court of the Bassa. He was soon distinguished for his magnificence, and admitted, as a prince whose curiosity had brought him from distant countries, to an intimacy with the great officers, and frequent conversation with the Bassa himself

Me was at first inclined to believe, that the man must be pleased with his own condition, whom all approached with reverence, and heard with obedience, and who had the power to extend his edicts to a whole kingdom. "There can be no pleasure, said he, equal to that of feeling at once the joy of thousands all made happy by wise administration. Yet, since by the law of subordination, this sublime delight can be in one nation but the lot of one, it is surely reasonable to think, that there is some satisfaction more popular and accessible, and that millions can hardly be subjected to the will of a single man, only to fill his particular breast with incommunicable content."

These thoughts were often in his mind, and he found no solution of the difficulty. But as presents and civilities gained him more familiarity, he found that almost every man who stood high in employment hated all the rest, and was hated by them, and that their lives were a continual succession of plots and detections, stratagems and escapes, faction and treachery. Many of those

those who surrounded the Bassa, were sent only to writch and report his conduct, every tongue was muttering censure and every eye was searching for a fault

At last the letters of revocation arrived the Bassa was carried in chains to Constantinople and his name was mentioned no more

What are we now to think of the prerogatives of power said Rasselas to his sister is it without any efficacy to good? Or is the subordante degree only dangerous and the supreme safe and glorious? Is the Sult in the only happy man in his dominions? Or, is the Sult in himself subject to the torments of suspicion and the dread of enemies?

In a short time the second Bassa was deposed. The Sultan that had advanced him was murdered by the Janisaries and his successour had other views and different favourities.

THE PRINCESS PURSUES HER INQUIRY WITH MORE
DILIGENCE THAN SUCCESS

The princess in the mean time, insinuated berself into many families, for there are few doors through which liberality, joined with good humour cannot find its way. The drughters of many houses were airly and cheerful, but Nekayah had been too long accustomed to the conversation of Imlac and her brother to be much pleased with childish levity, and prattle which had no meaning. She found their Vol III. Br. thoughts thoughts narrow, their wishes low, and their merriment often artificial Their pleasures, poor as they were, could not be preserved pure, but were embittered by petty competitions and worthless emulation. They were always jealous of the beauty of each other, of a quality to which solicitude can add nothing, and from which detraction can take nothing away Many were in love with triflers like themselves, and many functed that they were in love when in truth they were only idle Their affection was not fixed on sense or vutue, and therefore seldom ended but in vexation. Then grief, however, like their joy, was transient; every thing floated in their mind unconnected with the past or future, so that one desire easily gave way to another, as a second stone cast into the water effaces and confounds the circles of the first.

But her purpose was to examine more deeply, and her affability easily persuaded the hearts that were swelling with sorrow, to discharge their secrets in her ear and those whom hope flattered, or prosperity delighted, often courted her to partake their pleasures

The princess and her brother commonly met in the evening in a private summer-house on the bank of the Nile, and related to each other the occurrences of the day. As they were sitting together, the princess cast her eyes upon the river that flowed before her "Answer, said she, great father of waters, thou that rollest thy floods through eighty native king Tell me if thou waterest through all thy course a single hibitation from which thou dost not hear the murmurs of complaint?

- 'You are then, said Ras clas not more success ful in private houses than I have been in courts'
- 'I have, since the last partition of our provinces, said the princess, enabled my self to enter familiarly into many families, where there was the fairest show of prosperity and peace, and know not one house that is not haunted by some fury that destroys their quiet
- "I did not seek ease among the poor because I concluded that there it could not be found. But I saw many poor whom I had supposed to live in affluence. Poverty has in large cities very different appearances at its often concealed in splendour and often in extraorgance. It is the care of a very great part of manhad to conceal their indigence from the rest, they support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for the morrow.
- 'This, however, was an evil which though frequent I saw with less pain because I could relieve it. Yet some have refused my bounties, more offended with my quickness to detect their wants, thin pleased with my readiness to succour them and others, whose exigencies compelled them to admit my kindness have never been able to forgive their benefactiess. Many, however have been sincerely strateful without the ostentation of gratitude, or the hope of other favours.

THE PRINCESS CONTINUES HER REMARKS UPON PRIVATE LIFE

NEKATAH perceiving her brother's attention fixed, proceeded in her namative.

- "In families, where there is or is not poverty, there is commonly discord—if a kingdom be, as Imlac tells us, a great family, a family likewise is a little kingdom, torn with factions, and exposed to revolutions—An unpractised observer expects the love of parents and children to be constant and equal, but this kindness seldom continues beyond the years of infancy—in a short time the children become rivals to their parents. Benefits are allayed by reproaches, and gratitude debased by envy
- "Parents and children seldom act in concert: each child endeavours to appropriate the esteem or fondness of the parents, and the parents, with yet less temptation, betray each other to their children; thus some place their confidence in the father, and some in the mother, and by degrees, the house is filled with artifices and fouds
- "The opinions of children and parents, of the young and the old, are naturally opposite, by the contrary effects of hope and despondence, of expectation and experience, without crime or folly on either side. The colours of life in youth and age appear different, as the face of nature in spring and winter. And how can children credit the assertions of parents, which then own eyes show them to be false?

" Tew parents act in such a manner as much to enforce then maxims by the credit of their lives The old man trusts wholly to slow continuance and gradual progres ion the youth expects to force his way by genius vigour and precipitance. The old man pays regard to riches and the youth reverences vitue The old man deines prudence the vouth commits himself to magnanimity and chance soung man who intends no ill, believes that none is intended, and therefore acts with openness and can dour but his father having suffered the injuries of fraud is impelled to suspect, and too often allured to practise it. Age looks with anger on the temerity of youth and youth with contempt on the scrupulo Thus parents and children, for the greatest part live on to love less and less and, if those whom nature has thus closely united are the torments of each other where shall we look for tenderness and consolition?

* Surely said the prince, you must have been unforturned in your choice of acquaintance. I am unwilling to believe that the most tender of all relations is thus impeded in its effects by natural necessity.

Omestick discord, answered she is not inevitably and fitally necessary but yet it is not easily a oided. We seldom see that a whole family is surtious the good and evil cannot well agree and the evil can yet less igree with one mother even the virtuous fall sometimes to variance when their sittles are of different kinds and tending to extremes In general those papents have most reverence who most deserve it for he that have well cannot be despised.

Many other exils infest private life. Some are the slaves of servants whom they have trusted with their affairs. Some are kept in continual anxiety to the capitoe of rich relations, whom they cannot please, and dare not offend. Some husbands are imperious, and some wives perverse: and, as it is always more easy to do exil than good, though the wisdom or virtue of one can very rarely make many happy, the folly or vice of one may often make many miserable."

"If such be the general effect of manage, said the prince, I shall, for the future, think it dangerous to connect my interest with that of another, lest I should be unhappy by my partner's fault"

"I have met, said the princess, with many who live single for that reason, but I never found that their prudence ought to raise envy They dream away their time without friendship, without fondness, and are driven to rid themselves of the day, for which they have no use, by childish amusements, or vicious de-They act as beings under the constant sense of some known inferiority, that fills their minds with rancour, and their tongues with censure peevish at home, and malevolent abroad, and, as the outlaws of human nature, make it their business and their pleasure to disturb that society which debais them from its privileges. To live without feeling or exciting sympathy, to be fortunate without adding to the felicity of others, or afflicted without tasting the balm of pity, is a state more gloomy than solitude it is not retreat, but exclusion from Marriage has many pains, but celibacy has no pleasures."

"What then is to be done? said Rassel's, the more we inquire, the less we can resolve—Surely he is most likely to please himself, that has no other inclination to regard."

DISQUISITION UPON GREATNESS

THE conversation had a short pause The prince, having considered his sister a observations, told her. that she had surveyed life with prejudice and supposed misery where she did not find it "Your nar rative, says he throws yet a darker gloom upon the prospects of futurity the predictions of Imlac were but faint sketches of the evils printed by Nekryah I have been lately convinced that quiet is not the daughter of grandeur, or of power that her presence is not to be bought by wealth, nor enforced by con quest It is evident that as any man acts in a wider compass he must be more exposed to opposition from enmity, or miscarriage from chance whoever has muny to please or to govern, must use the ministry of many agents, some of whom will be wicked, and some ignorant, by some he will be misled, and by others betrayed If he gratifies one he will offend another those that are not favoured will think them selves injured, and, since favours can be conferred but upon few, the greater number will be always discontented "

'The discontent, said the princess which is thus unreasonable 'I hope that I shall always have spirit to despise, and you power to repress

" Discontent, answered Rasselas, will not always be without reason under the most just and vigilant administration of publick affairs. None, however attentive, can always discover that merit which indigence or faction may happen to obscure, and none, however powerful, can always reward it Yet, he that sees inferiour desert advanced above him, willnaturally impute that preference to partiality or caprice; and, indeed, it can scarcely be hoped that any man, however magnanimous by nature, or exalted by condition, will be able to persist for ever in the fixed and mexorable justice of distribution, he will sometimes indulge his own affections, and sometimes those of his favourites, he will permit some to please him who can never serve him, he will discover in those whom he loves, qualities which in reality they do not possess, and to those, from whom he receives pleasure, he will in his turn endeavour to give it will recommendations sometimes prevail which were purchased by money, or by the more destructive butery of flattery and servility

/" He that has much to do will do something wrong, and of that wrong must suffer the consequences. and, if it were possible that he should always act rightly, yet when such numbers are to judge of his conduct, the bad will censure and obstruct him by malevolence, and the good sometimes by mistake

"The highest stations cannot therefore hope to be the abodes of happiness, which I would willingly believe to have fled from thrones and palaces to seats of humble privacy and placid obscurity For what can hinder the satisfaction, or intercept the expectations, of him whose abilities are adequate to his em-

ployments who sees with his own eyes the whole circuit of his influence who chooses by his own know ledge all whom he trusts, and whom none are tempted to deceive by hope or fear. Surely he has nothing to do but to love and to be loved, to be viituous and to be happy

Whether perfect happiness would be procured by perfect goodness, said Nel avait this world will never afford an opportunity of deciding. But this at least, may be maintained that we do not always find visible happiness in proportion to visible vitue. All natural and almost all political evil are incident alike to the bad and good, they are confounded in the misery of a framine, and not much distinguished in the fury of a faction, they sink together in a tempest, and are driven together from their country by maiders. All that virtue can afford is quictness of conscience a steady prospect of a happiner state, this may enable us to endure claimity with patience; but rentember that patience must suppose pluin.

RASSELAS AND NEKAYAH CONTINUE THLIR CONVERSATION

Tear Princess, said Rasselas, you fall into the common errours of exaggeratory declamation, by producing, in a familiar disquisition, examples of national calamities, and scenes of extensive misery, which are found in books rather than in the world, and which, as they are horid, are ordained to be rare. Let us not imagine evils which we do not feel, nor injure life by misrepresentations. I cannot bear that querulous eloquence which threatens every city with a siege like that of Jerusalem, that makes famine attend on every flight of locusts, and suspends pestilence on the wing of every blast that issues from the south

"On necessary and mevitable evils, which overwhelm kingdoms at once, all disputation is vain: when they happen they must be endured. But it is evident, that these buists of universal distress are more dreaded than felt; thousands and ten thousands flourish in youth, and wither in age, without the knowledge of any other than domestick evils, and share the same pleasures and vexations, whether their kings are mild or cruel, whether the armies of their country pursue their enemies, or retreat before them. While courts are disturbed with intestine competitions, and ambassadors are negotiating in foreign countries, the smith still plies his anvil, and the husbandman drives his plough forward, the necessaries of life are required and obtained and the successive business of the seasons continues to make its wonted revolutions

"Let us cease to consider what perhaps, may never happen and what, when it shall happen will laugh at human speculation. We will not endeavour to modify the motions of the elements of to fix the destiny of kingdoms. It is our business to consider what beings like us may perform each labouring for his own happiness by promoting within his circle, however narrow, the happiness of others.

"Marriage is evidently the dictate of nature men and women are made to be companions of each other, and therefore I cannot be persuaded but that marriage is one of the means of happiness is I know not said the prince is whether marriage be more than one of the innumerable modes of human misery. When I see and reckon the various forms of connubral infelicity, the unexpected causes of lasting discord the diversities of temper the oppositions of opinion, the rude collisions of contrary desire where both are urged by violent impulses the obstitute contests of disagreeable virtues, where both are supported by consciousness of good intention, I am sometimes disposed to think with the severel casuists of most nations, that marriage is rather permitted than approved and that none but by the instigation of a passion too much indulged, entangle themselves with indissoluble compacts.

"You seem to forget replied Rasselas that you have, even now represented celibrary as less happy than marriage. Both conditions in whe bad but they cannot both be worst. Thus it happens when wrong wrong opinions are entertained, that they mutually destroy each other, and leave the mind open to truth"

"I did not expect, answered the princess, to hear that imputed to falsehood which is the consequence only of frailty To the mind, as to the eye, it is difficult to compare with exactness objects vást in then extent, and various in their parts Where we see or conceive the whole at once, we readily note the discriminations, and decide the preference but of two systems, of which neither can be surveyed by any human being in its full compass of magnitude and multiplicity of complication, where is the wonder that judging of the whole by parts, I am alternately affected by one and the other as either presses on my memory or fancy? We differ from ourselves just as we differ from each other, when we see only part of the question, as in the multifai ious relations of politicks and morality, but when we perceive the whole at once, as in numerical computations, all agree in one judgment, and none ever varies his opinion."

"Let us not add, said the prince, to the other evils of life, the bitterness of controversy, nor endeavour to vie with each other in subtilties of argument. We are employed in a search, of which both are equally to enjoy the success, or suffer by the miscarriage. It is therefore fit that we assist each other. You surely conclude too hastily from the infelicity of marriage against its institution, will not the misery of life prove equally that life cannot be the gift of Heaven? The world must be peopled by marriage, or peopled without it"

Neknith is not my care, and needs not be yours

I see no danger that the present generation should omit to leave successours belind them we are not now inquiring for the world but for ourselves

The good of the whole says Ras elis, is the same with the good of all its parts. It mairings be best for markind it must be evidently best for individuals or a permanent and necessary duty must be the cause of evil and some must be inevitably sacrificed to the convenience of others. In the estimate which you have made of the two states, it appears that the incommodities of a single life are in a great measure, necessary and certain but those of the conjugal state accidental and avoidable.

I cannot forbear to flatter mixelf that prudence and benevolence will make mairinge happy. The general folly of mankind is the cause of general complaint. What can be expected but disappointment and repentance from a choice made in he immaturity of youth, in the addour of desire without judyment without foresight, without inquiry after conformity of opinions similarity of manners rectitude of judyment or punity of sentiment?

"Such is the common process of narriage A youth or maiden meeting by chance of brought together by artifice exchange glances reciprocate civilities, go home, and dream of one mother Having

Having little to divert attention, or diversify thought, they find themselves uneasy when they are apart, and therefore conclude that they shall be happy together. They many, and discover what nothing but voluntary blindness before had concealed, they wear out life in altercations, and charge nature with cruelty

- "From those early marriages proceeds likewise the rivalry of parents and children, the son is cager to enjoy the world before the father is willing to forsake it, and there is hardly room at once for two generations. The daughter begins to bloom before the mother can be content to fade, and neither can forbear to wish for the absence of the other.
- "Surely all these evils may be avoided by that deliberation and delay which prudence prescribes to irrevocable choice. In the variety and jollity of youthful pleasures, life may be well enough supported without the help of a partner. Longer time will increase experience, and wider views will allow better opportunities of inquity and selection one advantage, at least, will be certain, the parents will be visibly older than their children."
- "What leason cannot collect, said Nekayah, and what experiment has not yet taught, can be known only from the report of others \ Thave been told that late marriages are not eminently happy. This is a question too important to be neglected, and I have often proposed it to those, whose accuracy of remark, and comprehensiveness of knowledge, made their suffiages worthy of regard. They have generally determined, that it is dangerous for a man and woman to suspend their fate upon each other, at a time when opinions opinions are fixed, and habits are established when friendships have been contracted on both sides when life has been planned into method, and the mind has long enjoyed the contemplation of its own prospects

"It is scarcely possible that two travelling through the world under the conduct of chance, should have been both directed to the same path, and it will not often happen that either will quit the track which custom has made pleasing When the desultory levity of youth has settled into regularity, it is con succeeded by pride ashamed to yield or obstinicy delighting to contend And even though mutual esteem produces mutual desire to please time itself, as it modifies unchangeably the external mien deter mines likewise the direction of the passions and gives an inflexible rigidity to the manners customs are not easily broken he that attempts to change the course of his own life very often labours in vain and how shall we do that for others, which we are seldom able to do for ourselves?

"But surely, interposed the prince, you suppose the chief motive of choice forgotten or neglected Whenever I shall seek a wife, it shall be my first question whether she be willing to be led by reason?"

"Thus it is said Nekay in that philosophers are deceived. There are a thousand familial disputes which reason never can decide questions that elude investigation and make logick ridiculous, cases where something must be done and where little can be said. Consider the state of mankind and inquire how few can be supposed to act upon any occasions whether small or great, with all the reasons of action present.

present to then minds Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness, who should be doomed to adjust by reason, every morning, all the minute detail of a domestick day

- "Those who many at an advanced age, will probably escape the encroachments of their children; but, in diminution of this advantage, they will be likely to leave them, ignorant and helpless, to a guardian's mercy: or, if that should not happen, they must at least go out of the world before they see those whom they love best either wise or great
- "From their children, if they have less to fear, they have less also to hope, and they lose, without equivalent, the joys of early love, and the convenience of uniting with manners pliant, and minds susceptible of new impressions, which might wear away their dissimilitudes by long cohabitation, as soft bodies, by continual attrition, conform their surfaces to each other.
- "I believe it will be found that those who marry late are best pleased with their children, and those who marry early with their partners"
- "The union of these two affections, said Rasselas, would produce all that could be wished. Perhaps there is a time when marriage might unite them, a time neither too early for the father, nor too late for the husband"
- "Every hour, answered the princess, confirms my prejudice in favour of the position so often uttered by the mouth of Imlac, 'That nature sets her gifts on the right hand and on the left' Those conditions, which flatter hope, and attract desire, are so constituted, that as we approach one, we recede from another.

mother There are goods to opposed that we cannot seeze both but, by too much prudence may pass be tween them at too great a distance to reach either. This is often the fate of long consideration, he does nothing who ende wours to do more than is allowed to humanity. Thatter not yourself with contrarieties of pleasure. Of the blessings set before you make your choice and be content. No man can taste the fruits of autumn while he is delighting his seent with the flowers of the spring no man can, at the same time, fill his cup from the source and from the mouth of the Nile.

IMLAC ENTERS AND CHANGES THE CONVERSATION

Here Imbre entered and interrupted them "Imbre, said Risselas, I have been taking from the princess the dismal history of private life, and amalmost discouraged from further search

- "It seems to me, said Imlac, that while you are making the choice of life, you neglect to live. You wander about a single city, which however large and diversified can now afford few novelties, and forget that you are in a country, famous among the earliest monuchies for the power and wisdom of its inhabitants, a country where the sciences first dawned that illuminate the world, and beyond which the arts can not be traced of civil society or domestick life.

strongly lead me to survey piles of stone, or mounds of earth; my business is with man. I came littler not to measure fragments of temples, or trace choked aqueducts, but to look upon the various scenes of the present world?

"The things that are now before us, said the princess, require attention, and deserve it. What have I to do with the heioes or the monuments of ancient times? with times which never can return, and heroes, whose form of life was different from all that the present condition of mankind requires or allows?"

"To know any thing, returned the poet, we must know its effects; to see men we must see their works, that we may learn what reason has dictated or passion has incited, and find what are the most powerful motives of action. To judge rightly of the present we must oppose it to the past, for all judgment is comparative, and of the future nothing can be known. The truth is, that no mind is much employed upon the present recollection and anticipation fill up almost all our moments. Our passions are joy and grief, love and hatred, hope and fear. Of joy and grief the past is the object, and the future of hope and fear, even love and hatred respect the past, for the cause must have been before the effect.

" The present state of things is the consequence of the former, and it is natural to inquire what were the sources of the good that we enjoy of the evil that we suffer If we act only for ourselves, to neglect the study of history is not prudent if we are intrusted with the care of others, it is not just /Ignorance, when it is voluntary is criminal, and he may properly be charged with evil, who refused to learn how he might prevent it

" There is no part of lustory so generally useful as that which relates the progress of the human mind, the gradual improvement of reason, the suc cessive advances of science, the vicissitudes of learn ing and ignorance which are the light and darkness of thinking beings, the extinction and resuscitation of arts and the revolutions of the intellectual world If accounts of battles and invasions are peculiarly the business of princes, the useful or elegant arts are not to be neglected those who have kingdoms to govern, have understandings to cultivate

" Example is always more efficacious than pre cept A soldier is formed in wai, and a painter must copy pictures In this, contemplative life has the advantage great actions are seldom seen, but the labours of art are always at hand for those who desire to know what art has been able to perform

When the eve or the imagination is struck with an uncommon work, the next transition of an active mind is to the means by which it was performed Here begins the true use of such contemplation we enlarge our comprehension by new ideas, and perlups recover some art lost to mankind, or learn what is less perfectly known in our own country CC2 least.

- "I am willing, said the prince, to see all that can deserve my search" "And I, said the princess, shall rejoice to learn something of the manners of antiquity"
- "The most pompous monument of Egyptian greatness, and one of the most bulky works of manual industry, said Imlac, are the pyramids; fabricks raised before the time of history, and of which the earliest narratives afford us only uncertain traditions. Of these, the greatest is still standing very little injured by time"
 - "Let us visit them to-morrow, said Nekayah I have often heard of the pyramids, and shall not rest till I have seen them within and without with my own eyes"

CHAP. XXXI

THEY VISIT THE PYRAMIDS.

The resolution being thus taken, they set out the next day. They laid tents upon their camels, being resolved to stay among the pyramids till their curiosity was fully satisfied. They travelled gently, turned aside to every thing remarkable, stopped from time to time and conversed with the inhabitants, and observed the various appearances of towns ruined and inhabited, of wild and cultivated nature.

When they came to the great pyramid, they were astonished at the extent of the base, and the height of the top Imlac explained to them the principles upon which the pyramidal form was chosen for a fibrick, intended to co extend its duration with that of the world he showed that its gradual dimmu tion gave it such stability, as defeated all the common attacks of the elements, and could scarcely be overthrown by earthquakes themselves, the least resistible of natural violence. A concussion that should shat ter the pyramid would threaten the dissolution of the comment.

They measured all its dimensions, and pitched their tents at its foot. Next dip they prepared to enter its interiour apartments, and having hired the common guides, climbed up to the first passage, when the favourite of the princess looking into the cristly, stepped back and trembled. "Pekuah, said the princess of what art thou afraid?" "Of the narrow entrance inswered the hady and of the dreadful gloom. I dare not enter a place which must surely be inhabited by unquiet soils. The original possessors of these dreadful vailts will start up before us, and perhaps shut us in for ever. She spoke, and threw her arms round the need of her mistress.

"If all your fear be of apparations, said the prince I will promise your safety—there is no danger from the daid, lie that is once buried will be seen no more

'That the dead are seen no more, said Imbre, I will not undertake to maintain, against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages, and of all nations. There is no people, rude or learned among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed.

This opinion, which perhaps prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its tiuth—those, that never heard of one another, would not have agreed in a tale which nothing but experience can make credible. That it is doubted by single cavillers, can very little weaken the general evidence, and some who deny it with their tongues confess it by their fears.

- "Yet I do not mean to add new terrours to those which have already seized upon Pekuah. There can be no reason why spectres should haunt the pyramid more than other places, or why they should have power or will to hurt innocence and purity Our entrance is no violation of their privileges, we can take nothing from them, how then can we offend them?"
- "My dear Pekuah, said the princess, I will always go before you, and Imlac shall follow you member that you are the companion of the princess of Abissinia "
- "If the princess is pleased that her servant should die, returned the lady, let her command some death less dreadful than enclosure in this hourd cavern You know I date not disobey you I must go if you command me, but, if I once enter, I never shall come back "

The princess saw that her fear was too strong for expostulation of reproof, and embracing her, told her that she should stay in the tent till their return kuah was yet not satisfied, but entreated the princess not to pursue so dreadful a purpose as that of entering the recesses of the pyramid. "Though I cannot teach teach courage, said Nekay th, I must not learn cowardice, nor leave at last undone what I came latther only to do"

THEY EXTER THE PYLAMID

Perman descended to the tents, and the rest entered the pyramid they passed through the galleries, surveyed the vaults of marble, and examined the chest in which the body of the founder is supposed to have been reposited. They then sat down in one of the most spacious chambers to rest a while before they attempted to return

" We have now, said Imlac, gratified our minds with an exact view of the greatest work of man, except the wall of China

"Of the wall it is very casy to assign the motive. It secured a wealthy and timorous nation from the incursions of barbarrans, whose unskilfulness in arts made it easier for them to supply their wants by rapine than by industry, and who from time to time poured in upon the habitations of peaceful commerce, as vultures descend upon domestick fowl. Their celerity and fierceness made the will necessary, and their ignorance made it efficacious.

"But for the pyrumids no reason has ever been given adequate to the cost and I abour of the work. The nameworks of the chambers proves that it could afford no retreat from enemies and treasures might have been reposited at fulless expense with equal security. It cems to have been erected only in a compliance.

compliance with that hunger of imagination which preys incessantly upon life, and must be always appeased by some employment. Those who have already all that they can enjoy, must enlarge their desires. He that has built for use, till use is supplied, must begin to build for vanity, and extend his plan to the utmost power of human performance, that he may not be soon reduced to form another wish

"I consider this mighty structure as a monument of the insufficiency of human enjoyments. A king, whose power is unlimited, and whose treasures surmount all real and imaginary wants, is compelled to solace, by the election of a pyramid, the satiety of dominion and tastelessness of pleasures, and to amuse the tediousness of declining lift, by seeing thousands labouring without end, and one stone, for no purpose, laid upon another. Whoever thou art, that, not content with a moderate condition, imaginest happiness in royal magnificence, and dreamest that command or riches can feed the appetite of novelty with perpetual gratifications, survey the pyramids, and confess thy folly!"

MISFORTUNE.

THEY rose up, and returned through the cavity at which they had entered, and the princess prepared for her favourite a long narrative of dark labyrinths, and costly rooms, and of the different impressions which the varieties of the way had made upon her But

But when they came to their truin, they found every one silent and dejected—the men discovered shame and fear in their countenances, and the women were weeping in the tents

What had happened they did not try to conjecture, but immediately inquired "You had scarcely entered into the pyramid, and one of the attendants, when a troop of Arabanshed upon us we were too few to resist them, and too slow to escape. They were about to search the tents, set us on our camels, and drive us along before them, when the approach of some Turkish horsemen put them to flight but they seized the lady Pekurh with her two maids, and curried them away the Turks are now pursuing them by our instigation, but I fear they will not be able to overtake them."

The princess was overpowered with surprise and guef. Rasselas, in the first heat of his resentment, ordered his servants to follow him, and prepared to pursue the robbers with his sabre in his hand. Sir, and Imlace what can you hope from violence or valour? the Arabs are mounted on horses trained to buttle and retreat, we have only beasts of burden. By leaving our piesent station we may lose the princess but cannot hope to regain Pel uah

In a short time the Turks returned having not been able to reach the enemy. The princess burst out into new lamentations and Rasselas could scarcely folbear to reproach them with cow indice, but Imlac was of opinion that the escape of the Arabs was no allotton to their misfortune for perhaps they would have killed their captives rather than have resigned them.

THEY RETURN TO CAIRO WILHOUT PIKUAH.

They returned to Cano repenting of their currosity, censuring the negligence of the government, lamenting their own rashness which had neglected to procure a guard, imagining many expedients by which the loss of Pekuah might have been prevented, and resolving to do something for her recovery, though none could find any thing proper to be done

Nekayah retired to her chamber, where her women attempted to comfort her, by telling her that all had their troubles, and that lady Pekuah had enjoyed much happiness in the world for a long time, and might reasonably expect a change of fortune. They hoped that some good would befall her wheresoever she was, and that their mistress would find another friend who might supply her place.

The puncess made them no answer, and they continued the form of condolence, not much gueved in their hearts that the favourite was lost

Next day the prince presented to the Bassa a memorial of the wrong which he had suffered, and a petition for redress. The Bassa threatened to punish the robbers, but did not attempt to catch them, nor indeed, could any account or description be given by which he might direct the pursuit

more crimes than they can punish and more wrongs than they can rediess, set themselves at ease by in discriminate negligence and presently forget the request when they lose sight of the petitioner

Imlac then ende wourd to sain some intelligence by pin ate agents. He found many who pretended to an exact knowledge of all the haunts of the Arab, and to regular correspondence with their chiefs and who readily undertook the recovery of Pekuah. Of these, some were furnished with money for their journey, and came back no more some were liberally paid for accounts which a few days discovered to be false. But the princess would not suffer any means, however improbable to be left untried. While she was doing something she kept her hope alive. As one expedient failed, an other was suggested, when one messenger returned unsuccessful unother was despatched to a different quarter.

I wo months had now passed and of Pekuah no thing had been heard, the hopes which they had endeavoured to raise in each other grew more languid and the princess, when she saw nothing more to be tried, sunk down inconsolable in hopeless dejection. A thousand times she reproached herself with the easy compliance by which she permitted her fivourate to stry behind her "Had not my fondness said she, lessened my authority, Peku ih had not dared to talk of her terroirs. She ought to have feared me more than specties. A severe look would have overpowered her, a percomptory command would have compelled obedience. Why did foolish indulgance prevail upon me? Why did I not speak, and refuse to hear?

" Great

"Great Princess, said Imlac, do not reproach yourself for your virtue, or consider that as blameable by which evil has accidentally been caused Your tenderners for the timulity of Pekuah was generous and kind. When we act according to our duty, we commit the event to Him by whose laws our actions are governed, and who will suffer none to be finally punished for obcdence. When, in prospect of some good, whether natural or moral, we break the rules prescribed us, we withdraw from the direction of superious wisdom, and take all consequences upon ourselves. Man cannot so far know the connection of causes and events, as that he may renture to do wrong in order to do right. When we pursue our end by lawful means, we may always console our miscarriage by the hope of future recompense . When we consult only our own policy, and attempt to find a nearer way to good, by overleaping the settled boundaries of right and wrong, we cannot be happy even by success, because we cannot escape the consciousness of our fault, but, if we miscarry, the disappointment is incinediably embittered How comfortless is the sorrow of him who feels at once the pangs of guilt, and the vexation of calamity which guilt has brought upon him !

"Consider, Princess, what would have been your condition, if the lady Pekuah had entreated to accompany you, and being compelled to stay in the tents, had been carried away, or how would you have born the thought, if you had forced her into the pyramid, and she had died before you in agonies of terrour?"

The women by whom he is a attended liner nothing of her real condition, and therefore he could not to talk to them but with caution and reserve. She began to remit her curio its, having no creat care to collect notions which she had no convenience of uttering. Rasselas endeavoured first to comfort, and afterwards to divert her, he hard musicians, to whom she seemed to listen, but did not hear them, and procured masters to instruct her in various arts, whose lectures, when they visited her again, were again to be repeated. She had lost her taste of pleasure, and her ambition of excellence. And her mind, though forced into short excursions, always recurred to the image of her friend.

Imlac was every morning carnestly enjoined to renew his inquities, and was asked every night whether he had yet heard of Pckuah, till not being able to return the princess the answer that she desned, he was less and less willing to come into her presence She observed his backwardness, and commanded him to attend her. You are not, said she, to confound impatience with resentment, or to suppose that I charge you with negligence, because I repine at your unsuccessfulness I do not much wonder at your absence, I know that the unhappy are never pleasing, and that all naturally avoid the contagion of misery To hear complaints is wearisome alike to the wietched and the happy: for who would cloud, by adventitious grief, the short gleams of gayety which life allows us? or who, that is struggling under his own evils, will add to them the miseries of another?

The time is at hand, when none shall be distuibed any longer by the sighs of Nekayah my search after happiness is now at an end. I am resolved to retire from the world with all its flatteries and deceits, and will hide myself in solitude without any other care than to compo e my thoughts, and regulate my hours by a constant succe sion of inno cent occupations, till, with a mind purified from all earthly desires. I shall enter into that state to which all are hastening, and in which. I hope again to enjoy the friendship of Pekuah."

"Do not entringle your mind, said Imbre, by irrevocable determinations, nor increase the burden of life by a voluntary accumulation of misery the weariness of retirement will continue or increase when the loss of Pekuah is forgotten. That you have been deprived of one pleasure, is no very good reason for rejection of the rest."

'Since Pekuah was taken from me, said the princess, I have no pleasure to reject or to be tain. She that has no one to love or trust has hitle to hope. She wants the radical principle of happiness. We may, perhaps, allow that what satisfaction this world can afford, must arise from the conjunction of wealth, knowledge, and goodness, wealth is nothing but as it is bestowed, and knowledge no thing but as it is communicated, they must there fore be imparted to others and to whom could I now delight to impart them? Goodness affords the only comfort which can be enjoyed without a partner, and goodness may be practised in retirement.

"How fir solitude may admit goodness or advance it, I shall not, replied Imlie, dispute it present Remember the confession of the prous hermit You will wish to return into the world, when the image of your companion has left your thoughts' "That time, said Nel yah, will never come The generous frankness, the modest obsequiousness, and the faithful secrecy of my dear Pekuah, will always be more missed, as I shall live longer to see vice and folly "

"The state of a mind oppressed with a sudden calamity, said Imlac, is like that of the fabulous inhabitants of the new created earth, who, when the first night came upon them, supposed that day would When the clouds of sorrow gather never return over us, we see nothing beyond them, nor can imagine how they will be dispelled yet a new day succeeded to the night, and sorrow is never long without a dawn of ease But they who restrain themselves from receiving comfort, do as the savages would have done, had they put out then eyes when it was dark Our minds, like our bodies, are in continual flux, something is hourly lost, and something acquired To lose much at once is inconvenient to either, but while the vital powers remain uninjured, nature will find the means of reparation Distance has the same effect on the mind as on the eye, and while we glide along the stream of time, whatever we leave behind us is always lessening, and that which we approach increasing in magnitude | Do not suffer life to stagnate, it will grow muddy for want of motion. commit yourself again to the current of the world, Pekuah will vanish by degrees, you will meet in your way some other favourite, or learn to diffuse yourself in general conversation"

"At least, said the Prince, do not despair before all remedies have been tried the inquiry after the unfortunate lady is still continued, and shall be carried on with

with yet greater diligence, on condition that you will promise to wait a year for the event, without any unalterable resolution"

Nel web thought this a reasonable demand, and made the promise to her brother, who had been advised by Imbre to require it. Imbre had, indeed, no great hope of reguining Pekuah, but he supposed, that if he could secure the interval of a year, the princess would be then in no danger of a cloister.

PEI UAH IS STILL REMI MBERED THE PROGRESS OF SORROW

NET AT AIT, seeing that nothing was omitted for the recovery of her fivourite, and having by her promise, set her intention of retirement at a distance, began im perceptibly to return to common cares and common pleasures. She rejoiced without her own consent at the suspension of her sorrow and sometimes caught herself with indignation in the act of turning away her mind from the remembrance of her, whom yet she resolved never to forget

She then appointed a certain hour of the day for meditation on the merits and fondness of Pekuah, and for some weeks retired constantly at the time fixed, and returned with her eyes swollen and her counterance clouded. By degrees she grew less seru pulous and suffered any important and pressing avocation to delay the tribute of daily terrs. She then yielded to less occasions, sometimes forgot what you III.

Her real love of Peknah was yet not diminished. A thousand occurrences brought her back to memory, and a thousand wants, which nothing but the confidence of friendship can supply, made her frequently She, therefore, solicited Imlac never to desist from inquity, and to leave no art of intelligence untried, that, at least, she might have the comfort of knowing that she did not suffer by negligence or sluggishness "Yet what, said she, is to be expected from our pursuit of happiness, when we find the state of life to be such, that happiness itself is the cause of misery? Why should we endeavour to attain that, of which the possession cannot be secured? I shall henceforward fear to yield my heart to excellence, however bright, or to fondness, however tender, lest I should lose again what I have lost in Pekuah"

THE PRINCESS HEARS NEWS OF PEKUAH.

In seven months, one of the messengers, who had been sent away upon the day when the promise was drawn from the princess, returned, after many unsuccessful rambles from the borders of Nubra, with an account that Pekuah was in the hands of an Arab chief, who possessed a castle or fortress on the extremity of Egypt. The Arab, whose revenue was plunder, was willing to restore her, with her two attendants, for two hundred ounces of gold.

The price was no subject of debate. The princess was in ecstastes, when she heard that her favourite was alive, and might so cheaply be ransomed could not think of deliging for a moment Peku ilis Imponess or her own, but entrested her brother to send back the messenger with the sum required Imlac being consulted was not very confident of the vergeity of the relator, and was still more doubtful of the Aribs futh who might if he were too liberally trusted, det un at once the money and the captives. He thought it dangerous to put them selves in the power of the Airb, by going into his district, and could not expect that the Royer would so much expose himself is to come into the lower country, where he might be seized by the forces of the Bassa

It is deficult to negotiate where neither will trust But Imbr., ifter some deliberation, directed the messenger to propose that Pekurih should be conducted by ten horsemen to the monastery of St Antony, which is situated in the deserts of Upper Fgypt, where she should be met by the same number, and her ransom should be paid

I hat no time might be lost, as they expected that the proposal would not be refused, they immediately began their journey to the monastery, and when they arrived, Imbe went forward with the former messenger to the Arab's fortress. Rasselas was desirous to go with them but neither his sister nor Imbe would consent. The Arab, according to the custom of his nation, observed the laws of hos pitality with great exactness to those who put themselves into his power, and, in a few days brou ht

Pekuah with her maids, by easy journeys, to the place appointed, where receiving the stipulated price, he restored her with great respect to liberty and her friends, and undertook to conduct them back towards Cano beyond all danger of robbery or violence

The princess and her favourite embraced each other with transport too violent to be expressed, and went out together to pour the tears of tenderness in secret, and exchange professions of kindness and gratitude. After a few hours they returned into the refectory of the convent, where, in the presence of the prior and his brothien, the prince required of Pekuah the history of her adventures.

CHAP XXXVII.

THE ADVENTURES OF THE LADY PEKUAH.

AT what time, and in what manner, I was forced away, said Pekuah, your servants have told you. The suddenness of the event struck me with surprise, and I was at first rather stupified than agitated with any passion of either fear or sorrow. My confusion was increased by the speed and tumult of our flight, while we were followed by the Turks, who, as it seemed, soon despaned to overtake us, or were afraid of those whom they made a show of menacing

"When the Arabs saw themselves out of danger they slackened their course, and as I was less harassed by external violence, I began to feel more uneasiness in my mind. After some time we stopped near a spring shaded with trees in a pleasant meadow,

where we were set upon the ground, and offered such refreshments as our masters were partiking I was suffered to sit with my milds apart from the rest, and none attempted to comfort or insult us Here I first begin to feel the full weight of my misery The girls sit weeping in silence, and from time to time looked on me for succour. I knew not to v hat condition we were doomed, nor could conjecture v here would be the place of our captivity. or whence to draw any hone of deliverance. I was m the hands of robbers and savages and had no reason to suppose that their pity was more than then justice or that they would forbear the gratification of my irdour of desire or exprise of crucity I, however, lissed my maids and endeavoured to pacify them by remarking, that we were yet treated with deceney and that, since we were now carried beyoud pursuit, there was no danger of violence to our live

" When we were to be set again on horseback, my made clang round me and refused to be parted. but I commanded them not to unitate the e who lind us in their power We ti welled the remaining part of the day through an unfacquented and path less country and came by moonlight to the side of a hill where the rest of the troop was stationed Then tents were pitched and their fires I indled and our chief was welcomed as a man much beloved by his depend ints

' We were received into a large tent where we found y omen who had attended then husbands in the expedition. They set before us the supper which they had provided, and I eat it rather to encourage my mauls maids than to comply with any appetite of my own. When the meat was taken away, they spread the carpets for repose I was weary, and hoped to find in sleep that icmission of distress which nature seldom denies Ordering myself therefore to be undiest, I observed that the women looked very earnestly upon me, not expecting, I suppose, to see me so submissively attended When my upper vest was taken off, they were apparently struck with the splendour of my clothes, and one of them timorously laid her hand upon the embroidery She then went out, and in a short time came back with another woman, who seemed to be of higher rank, and greater authority She did, at her entrance, the usual act of reverence, and taking me by the hand, placed me in a smaller tent, spread with finer caipets, where I spent the night quietly with my maids

"In the moining, as I was sitting on the grass, the chief of the troop came towards me I rose up to receive him, and he bowed with great respect. " Illustrious lady, said he, my fortune is better than I had presumed to hope, I am told by my women, that I have a princess in my camp" "Sir, answered I, your women have deceived themselves and you; I am not a princess, but an unhappy stranger who intended soon to have left this country, in which I am now to be imprisoned for ever" "Whoever, or whencesoever, you are, returned the Arab, your dress, and that of your servants, show your rank to be high, and your wealth to be great Why should you, who can so easily procure your ransom, think yourself in danger of perpetual captivity? The purpose purpose of my incursions is to increase my riches, or, more properly to gather tribute. The sons of Ishin iel are the natural and hereditary loads of this part of the continent, which is usurped by late in viders, and low boin tyrints, from whom we are compelled to take by the sword what is denied to justice. The violence of war admits no distinction the lance that is lifted at guilt and power will some times full on innocence and gentleness.

' How little said I, did I expect that yesterday it should have fallen upon me!"

"Misfortunes, answered the Arab should always be expected—If the eye of hostility could learn reverence or pity excellence like yours had been exempt from mury—But the angels of affliction spread their toils alike for the virtuous and the wicked, for the mighty and the man—Do not be disconsolate—I am not one of the lawless and cruel rovers of the desert I know the rules of civil life—I will fix your ransom, give a passport to your messenger, and perform my stipulation with mee punctuality."

"You will easily believe that I was pleased with his courtest and finding that his predominant passion was desire of money. I began now to think my danger less for I knew that no sum would be thought too great for the release of Pekuah. I told him, that he should have no reason to charge me with ingratitude, if I was used with kindne's, and that any ransom which could be expected for a maid of common rank, would be paid but that he must not persist to rate me as a princess. He said, he would consider what he should demand, and then smiling, howed and returd

"Soon after the women came about me, each contending to be more officious than the other, and my maids themselves were served with reverence. We travelled onward by short journeys. On the fourth day the chief told me, that my ransom must be two hundred ounces of gold, which I not only promised him, but told him, that I would add fifty more, if I and my maids were honourably treated

"I never knew the power of gold before I com that time I was the leader of the troop. The march of every day was longer or shorter as I commanded, and the tents were pitched where I chose to rest. We now had camels and other conveniencies for travel, my own women were always at my side, and I amused myself with observing the manners of the vagrant nations, and with viewing remains of ancient edifices, with which these deserted countries appear to have been, in some distant age, lavishly embellished.

"The chief of the band was a man far from illiterate. he was able to travel by the stars or the compass, and had marked in his erratick expeditions, such places as are most worthy the notice of a passenger. He observed to me, that buildings are always best preserved in places little frequented, and difficult of access, for, when once a country declines from its primitive splendour, the more inhabitants are left, the quicker ruin will be made. Walls supply stones more easily than quarries, and palaces and temples will be demolished, to make stables of granate, and cottages of porphyry.

"Wr wandered about in this manner for some weeks. whether, is our chief pretended, for my critification. or as I rather suspected, for some convenience of his own I endersoured to appear contented where sullenness and resentment would have been of no use, and that endeavour conduced much to the calmness of my mind but my heart was always with Nekavah and the troubles of the night much overbalanced the amusements of the day My women. who threw all their cares upon their mistress set their minds at ease from the time when they saw me treated with respect, and gave themselves up to the incidental alleviations of our fatigue without solicitude or sorrow I was pleased with their pleasure, and animated with their confidence. My condition had lost much of its terrour, since I found that the Amb ranged the country merely to get riches Ava rice is an uniform and tractable vice other intellectual distempers are different in different constitutions of mind, that which sooths the pride of one will offend the pride of another, but to the favour of the covet ous there is a ready way bring money and nothing is denied

"At last we came to the dwelling of our chief, a stron, and spacious house built with stone in an island of the Nile which lies, as I was told, under the tropick "Lady, said the Arab, you shall rest after your journey a few weeks in this place, where you are to consider yourself as sovereign. My occupation is war. I have therefore chosen this obscure residence, from which I can issue unexpected, and to which I can retire unpursued. You may now repose in security here are few pleasures, but here is no danger." He then led me into the inner apartments, and seating me on the richest couch, bowed to the ground. His women, who considered me as a rival, looked on me with malignity, but being soon informed that I was a great lady detained only for my ransom, they began to vie with each other in obsequiousness and reverence.

"Being again comforted with new assurances of speedy liberty, I was for some days diverted from impatience by the novelty of the place The turrets overlooked the-country to a great distance, and afforded a view of many windings of the stream the day I wandered from one place to another, as the course of the sun varied the splendour of the prospect, and saw many things which I had never seen before The crocodiles and river-horses are common in this unpeopled region, and I often looked upon them with terroug, though I knew that they could not huit me For some time I expected to see mermaids and tutons, which, as Imlachas told me, the European travellers have stationed in the Nile, but no such beings ever appeared, and the Arab, when I inquired after them, laughed at my credulity

"At night the Aiab always attended me to a tower set apart for celestral observations, where he endeavoured to teach me the names and courses of the stars I had no great inclination to this study, but an appearance of attention was necessary to please my instructor who valued himself for his skill and in a little while I found some employment require to beguie the tediousness of time, which was to be passed it was amilst the same obtects I was wears of looling in the morning on things from which I had turned away weary in the evening I therefore was at lat willing to observe the stars rather than do nothin,, but could not always compose my thoughts, and was very often thunking on Nekryah, when others imagined me contemplating the sky Soon after the Arab went upon another expedition, and then my only pleasure was to talk with my maids about the accident by which we were carried may, and the happiness that we should all enjoy at the end of our captivity

"There were women in your Arib's fortress, said the princess, why did you not mate them your companions enjoy their conversation, and partike their diversions. In a place where they found husiness or amusement why should you alone sit corroded with idle melancholy? or why could not you bear, for a few months, that condition to which they were condefined for life.

Che diversions of the women, answered Pekuah, were only children play, by which the mind accus tomed to stronger operations could not be kept busy. I could do all which they delighted in doing by powers merely sensitive while my intellectual freul ties were flown to Cairo. They ran from room to room as a bird hops from wire to wire in his cage. They danced for the sake of motion, as lambs.

firsk in a meadow. One sometimes pretended to be huit, that the rest might be claimed, or hid herself, that another might seek her. Part of their time passed in watching the progress of light bodies that floated on the river, and part in marking the various forms into which clouds broke in the sky.

- "Then business was only needlework, in which I and my maids sometimes helped them, but you know that the mind will easily straggle from the fingers, nor will you suspect that captivity and absence from Nekayah, could receive solace from silken flowers
- " Nor was much satisfaction to be hoped from their conversation for of what could they be expected to talk? They had seen nothing, for they had lived from early youth in that narrow spot of what they had not seen they could have no knowledge, for they could not read. They had no ideas but of the few things that were within their view, and had hardly names for any thing but their clothes and then food. As I bore a superiou character, I was often called to terminate their quariels, which I decided as equitably as I could If it could have amused me to hear the complaints of each against the rest, I'might have been often detained by long stories; but the motives of their animosity were so small that I could not listen without intercepting the tale"
- "How, said Rasselas, can the Arab, whom you represented as a man of more than common accomplishments, take any pleasure in his seraglio when it is filled only with women like these? Are they exquisitely beautiful?"

"They do not said Pekuah, want that unaffecting and ignoble beauty which may subsist without sprightliness or sublimity, without energy of thought or dignity of virtue But to a man like the Arab such beauty was only a flower cusually plucked and carelesly thrown away. Whatever pleasures he might find among them, they were not those of friendship or society. When they were playing about him he looked on them with mattentive superiority . when they yied for his reguld, he sometimes turned aw y disgusted As they had no I nowledge, their talk could take nothing from the tediousne s of life as they had no choice, their fondness, or appearance of fondness, excited in him neitler pride nor gratitude, he was not evalted in his own esteem by the smiles of a woman a ho saw no other man, not was much obliged by that regard of which he could never know the sincerity, and which he might often per ceive to be exerted, not so much to delight him as to pain a rivil That which he gave, and they re ceived, as love, was only a careless distribution of superfluous time, such love as man can bestow upon that which he despises, such has neither hope nor fear, neither joy nor sorrow '

"You have leason, hady, to think yourself happy, said Imbre, that you have been thus easily dismissed How could a mind, hungry for knowledge be willing, in an intellectual famine, to lose such a banquet as Pekuah's conversation?"

"I am inclined to believe answered Pekuali, that he was for sometime in suspen e, for notwithstand ing his promise, whenever I proposed to dispatch a messenger messenger to Cano, he found some excuse for delay. While I was detained in his house he made many incursions into the neighbouring countries, and, perhaps, he would have refused to discharge me, had his plunder been equal to his wishes. He returned always courteous, related his adventures, delighted to hear my observations, and endeavoured to advance my acquaintance with the stars. When I importuned him to send away my letters, he soothed me with professions of honour and sincerity, and, when I could be no longer decently demed, put his troop again in motion, and left me to govern in his absence. I was much afflicted by this studied procrastination, and was sometimes afraid that I should be forgotten; that you would leave Cano, and I must end my days in an island of the Nile

"I grew at last hopeless and dejected, and cared so little to entertain him, that he for a while more frequently talked with my maids. That he should fall in love with them, or with me, might have been equally fatal, and I was not much pleased with the growing friendship. My auxiety was not long, for, as I recovered some degree of cheerfulness, he returned to me, and I could not forbear to despise my former uneasiness.

"He still delayed to send for my ransom, and would, perhaps, never have determined, had not your agent found his way to him. The gold which he would not fetch, he could not reject when it was offered. He hastened to prepare for our journey lather, like a man delivered from the pain of an intestine conflict. I took leave of my companions

in the house, who dismissed me with cold in difference

Nek is the having heard her favourite's relation, rose and embraced her, and Rassel's give her an hundred ounces of gold, which she presented to the Arab for the fifty that were promised

CH IP XXXIX

THE HISTORY OF A MAN OF LEARNING

I has returned to Caro, and were so well ple ised at finding themselves together, that none of them went much abroad. The prince began to love learning, and one day declared to Imlac, that he intended to devote himself to seience, and pass the ret of his days in literary solitude.

Before you make your final choice, answered Imlic you ought to examine its lazards, and con verse with some of those who are grown old in the commany of themselves I have just left the observa tory of one of the most learned astronomers in the world who has spent forty years in unwearied attention to the motions and appearances of the celestral bodies, and has drawn out his soul in endless calculations He admits a few friends once a month to hear his deductions and enjoy his discoveries. I was introduced as a man of knowledge worthy of his notice Men of various ideas, and fluent conversation, are commonly welcome to those whose thoughts have been long fixed upon a single point and who find the images of other things stealing away I delighted him with my remarks he smiled at the narrative of my travels, and was glad to forget the constella

"On the next day of vacation I renewed my visit, and was so fortunate as to please him again. He relaxed from that time the severity of his rule, and permitted me to enter at my own choice. I found him always busy, and always glad to be relieved. As each knew much which the other was deshous of learning, we exchanged our notions with great delight." I perceived that I had every day more of his confidence, and always found new cause of admiration in the profundity of his mind. His comprehension is vast, his memory capacious and retentive, his discourse is methodical, and his expression clear.

"His integrity and benevolence are equal to his learning. His deepest researches and most favourite studies, are willingly interrupted for any opportunity of doing good by his counsel or his riches. To his closest retreat, at his most busy moments, all are admitted that want his assistance: "For though I exclude idleness, and pleasure, I will never, says he, bar my doors against charity. To man is permitted the contemplation of the skies, but the practice of virtue is commanded."

"I visited him, said Imlac, with more and more fiequency, and was everytime more enamoused of his conversation. he was sublime without haughtiness, courteous without formality, and communicative without ostentation. I was at first, great Princess, of your opinion, thought him the happiest of mankind, and often congratulated him on the blessing that he enjoyed.

He seemed to hear nothing with indifference but the praises of his condition to which he always returned a general answer, and diverted the conversation to some other topick

"Amidst this willingness to be pleased, and I ibour to please I had quickly reason to imagine that some painful centiment pressed upon his mind. He often looked up earnestly towards the sun, and let his orice fall in the midst of his discourse. He would sometimes, when we were alone, gaze upon me in silence with the air of a man who longed to speak what he was yet resolved to suppress. He would often send for me with vehement injunctions of haste, though when I came to him, he had nothing extraordinary to say. And sometimes when I was leaving him, would call me back, pause a few moments and then dismiss me."

"AT last the time came when the secret burst his reserve. We were sitting together last night in the turnet of his house, watching the emersion of a satellite of Jupiter. A sudden tempest clouded the sky, and disappointed our observation. We sat a while silent in the darl, and then he addressed him self to me in these words. "Imperior Investigation of my life. Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless, and knowledge without integrity is dan gerous and direafful. I have found in thee all the Vol. III.

qualities requisite for trust, benevolence, experience, and fortitude I have long discharged an office which I must soon quit at the call of nature, and shall rejoice in the hour of imbeculity and pain to devolve it upon thee"

"I thought myself honoured by this testimony, and protested that whatever could conduce to his happiness would add likewise to mine"

"Hear, Imlac, what thou wilt not without difficulty credit I have possessed for five years the regulation of weather, and the distribution of the seasons the sun has listened to my dictates, and passed from tropick to tropick by my direction, the clouds, at my call, have pouted their waters, and the Nile has overflowed at my command, I have restrained the rage of the dogstar, and mitigated the fervours of the crab. The winds alone, of all the elemental powers, have hitherto refused my authority, and multitudes have perished by equinoctial tempests, which I found myself unable to prohibit or restrain. I have administered this great office with exact justice, and made to the different nations of the earth an impartial dividend of rain and sunshine. What must have been the misery of half the globe, if I had limited the clouds to particular regions, or confined the sun to either side of the equator!"

THE OPINION OF THE ASTRONOMER IS EXPIAINED AND JUSTIFIED

- "I suppose he discovered in me, through the obscurity of the room some tokens of amazement and doubt, for, after a short pause he proceeded thus"
- "Not to be easily credited will neither surprise nor offend me for I am, probably, the first of human beings to whom this trust has been imparted. Nor do I know whether to deem this distinction a leward or punishment since I have possessed it I have been far less happy than before, and nothing but the consciousness of good intention could have enabled me to support the werriness of unremitted vigilance.

"How long, Sir, said I, has this great office been

- "About ten years 190, stud he, my daily observations of the changes of the sky led me to consider, whether, if I had the power of the sersons, I could confer greater plenty upon the inhabitants of the earth. This contemplation fastened on my mind, and I sat days and nights in imaginary dominion, pouring upon this country and that the showers of feithly, and seconding every fall of run with a due proportion of sunshine. I had yet only the will to do good, and did not imagine that I should ever have the power.
- "One day, as I was looking on the fields wither ing with heat I felt in my mind a sudden wish that I could send rain on the southern mountains and raise the Nile to an inundation. In the hurry of my imagination I commanded rain to fall, and by comparing the time of my command with that of the mundation, I found that the clouds had listened to my lips"

"Might not some other cause, said I, produce this concurrence? the Nile does not always rise on the same day"

"Do not believe, said he, with impatience, that such objections could escape me: I reasoned long against my own conviction, and laboured against truth with the utmost obstinacy. I sometimes suspected myself of madness, and should not have dared to impart this secret but to a man like you, capable of distinguishing the wonderful from the impossible, and the inciedible from the false."

"Why, Sn, said I, do you call that incledible, which you know, or think you know, to be true?"

" Because, said he, I cannot prove it by any external cyidence, and I know too well the laws of demonstration to think that my conviction ought to influence another, who cannot, like me, be conscious I, therefore, shall not attempt to gain of its force credit by disputation It is sufficient that I feel this power, that I have long possessed, and every day excited it But the life of man is short, the infirmities of age increase upon mc, and the time will soon come, when the regulator of the year must mingle with the dust. The care of appointing a successor has long disturbed me, the night and the day have been spent in comparisons of all the characters which have come to my knowledge, and I have yet found none so worthy as thyself."

" He ir, therefo e, what I shall impart with attention, such as the welface of a world requires the task of a king be considered as difficult, who has the care only of a few millions, to whom he cannot do much good or harm, what must be the anxiety of him, on whom depends the action of the elements, and the great gifts of light and heat !-Hear me then fore with attention

" I have diligently considered the position of the earth and sun, and formed innumerable schemes in which I changed their situation I have sometimes turned uside the axis of the earth, and sometimes varied the celeptick of the sun but I have found it impossible to make a disposition by which the world may be advantaged what one region guins, another loses by an imaginable alteration, even without con sidering the distant parts of the solar system with which we are unacquanted Do not therefore, in thy administration of the year, indulge thy pride by innovation, do not please this elf with thinking that thou canst make the self rong ened to all future ages, by disordering the seasons. The memory of mischief is no de ir ible fime. Much less will it become thee to let kindness or interest prevail. Never rob other countries of run to pour it on thine own For us the Nile is sufficient "

" I promised, that when I possessed the power, I would use it with inflexible integrity, and he dis missed missed me, pressing my hand " "My heart, said he, will be now at rest, and my benevolence will no more destroy my quiet; I have found a man of wisdom and virtue, to whom I can cheerfully bequeath the inheritance of the sun"

The Prince heard this narration with very serious regard, but the Princess smiled, and Pekuah convulsed herself with laughter "Ladies, said Imlac, to mock the heaviest of human afflictions is neither charitable nor wise. Few can attain this man's knowledge, and few practise his virtues, but all may suffer his calamity. Of the uncertainties of our present state, the most dreadful and alarming is the uncertain continuance of reason."

The Princess was recollected, and the favourite was abashed Rasselas, more deeply affected, inquired of Imlac, whether he thought such maladies of the mind frequent, and how they were contracted?

CHAP XLIII.

THE DANGEROUS PREVALENCE OF IMAGINATION.

"DISORDERS of intellect, answered Imlac, happen much more often than superficial observers will easily believe. Perhaps, if we speak with rigorous exactness, no human mind is in its right state. There is no man whose imagination does not sometimes predominate over his reason, who can regulate his attention wholly by his will, and whose ideas will come and go at his command. No man will be found in whose mind any notions do not sometimes tyrannize, and force him to hope or fear beyond the limits of sober probability. All power of fancy.

over reason is a degree of insanity, but while this power is such as we can control and repress, it is not visible to others, nor considered as any deprayation of the mental figulties it is not pronounced madness but when it becomes ungovernable, and apparently influences speech or action

" To indulge the power of fiction, and send imaguntion out upon the wing, is often the sport of those who delight too much in silent speculation When we are alone we are not always busy, the labour of excogitation is too violent to last long, the ardour of inquiry will sometimes give way to idleness or satisty .He who has nothing external that can divert him, must find pleasure in his own thoughts, and must conceive himself what he is not, for who is pleased with what he is? He then expandes in boundless futurity, and culls from all imaginable conditions that which for the present moment he should most desire amuses his desires with impossible enjoyments, and confers upon his pride unattainable The mind dances from scene to scene, unites all pleasures in all combinations, and riots in delights, which nature and fortune, with all their bounty, cannot bestow

" In time, some particular train of ideas fixes " the attention, all other intellectual gratifications are rejected, the mind, in weariness or leisure recurs constantly to the favourate conception, and feasts on the luscious filschood whenever she is offended with the bitterness of truth By degrees the reign of funcy is confirmed, she grows first imperious, and in time de potick. Then fictions begin to operate as realities false opinions fisten upon upon the mind, and life passes in dreams of iapture or of anguish.

- "This, Sii, is one of the dangers of solitude, which the heimit has confessed not always to promote goodness, and the astronomer's misery has proved to be not always propitious to wisdom."
- "I will no more, said the favourite, imagine myself the queen of Abissinia. I have often spent the hours, which the Princess gave to my own disposal, in adjusting ceremonies and regulating the court. I have repressed the pride of the powerful, and granted the petitions of the poor, I have built new palaces in more happy situations, planted groves upon the tops of mountains, and have exulted in the beneficence of royalty, till, when the Princess entered, I had almost forgotten to bow down before her."
 - "And I, said the Princess, will not allow myself any more to play the shepherdess in my waking dreams. I have often soothed my thoughts with the quiet and innocence of pastoral employments, till I have in my chamber heard the winds whistle, and the sheep bleat sometimes fixed the lamb entangled in the thicket, and sometimes with my crook encountered the wolf. I have a dress like that of the village maids, which I put on to help my imagination, and a pipe on which I play softly, and suppose myself followed by my flocks."
 - "I will confess, said the Prince, an indulgence of fantastick delight more dangerous than yours. I have frequently endeavoured to image the possibility of a perfect government, by which all wrong should be restrained, all vice reformed, and all the subjects preserved in tranquility and innocence. This thought produced innumerable schemes of reformation, and dictated many useful regulations and salutary edicts. This has been the sport, and sometimes the labour of my solutide, and I start when I think with how little anguish I once supposed the death of my father and my brothers."

"Such, says Imlac, are the effects of visionary schemes when we first form them we I now them to be absurd, but familiance them by degrees, and in time lose sight of their folly

THEY DISCOURSE WITH AN OLD MAY

The evening was now far past, and they rose to return home. As they walked along the bank of the Nile, delighted with the beams of the moon quivering on the water, they saw at a small distance an old man, whom the Prince had often heard in the assembly of the sages. "Yonder, sud he is one whose years have calmed his passions but not clouded his reason, let us close the disquisitions of the night, by inquiring what are his sentiments of his own state, that we may know whether youth alone is to struggle with vention, and whether any better hope remains for the latter part of life.

Here the sage approached and saluted them They invited him to join their will and prattled awhile, as acquaintance that had unexpectedly met one another. The old man was cheerful and talk tave.

talkative, and the way seemed short in his company. He was pleased to find himself not disregarded, accompanied them to their house, and, at the Prince's request, entered with them. They placed him in the seat of honour, and set wine and conserves before him.

- "Sn, said the Princess, an evening walk must give to a man of learning, like you, pleasures which ignorance and youth can hardly conceive. You know the qualities and the causes of all that you behold, the laws by which the river flows, the periods in which the planets perform their revolutions. Every thing must supply you with contemplation, and renew the consciousness of your own dignity."
- "Lady, answered he, let the gay and the vigorous expect pleasure in their excursions; it is enough that age can obtain ease. To me the world has lost its novelty. I look round, and see what I remember to have seen in happier days. I rest against a tree, and consider that in the same shade I once disputed upon the annual overflow of the Nile with a friend who is now silent in the grave. I cast my eyes upwards, fix them on the changing moon, and think with pain on the vicissitudes of life. I have ceased to take much delight in physical truth, for what have I to do with those things which I am soon to leave?"
- "You may at least recreate yourself, said Imlac, with the recollection of an honourable and useful life, and enjoy the praise which all agree to give you"
- "Praise, said the sage, with a sigh, is to an old man an empty sound I have neither mother to be

be delighted with the reputation of her son, nor wife to partake the honours of her husband. I have outlived my friends and my rivals. Nothing is now of much importance for I cannot extend my interest beyond myself Youth is delighted with applause, because it is considered as the carnest of some future good and because the prospect of life is far extended but to me, who un now declining to decrepitude, there is little to be ferred from the maleyolence of men and yet less to be hoped from their affection or esteem Something they may yet tale away, but they can give me nothing Riches vould now be useless and high employment would be pain My retrospect of life recalls to my view many opportunities of good neglected, much time squandered upon trifles, and more lost in idleness and vacance. I leave many great designs unaftempted and many great attempts unfinished My mind is burdened with no heavy crime, and therefore I compose myself to tranquillity endeaour to abstract my thoughts from hopes and cares which, though reason knows them to be vun, still try to keep their old possession of the heart e pect with screen hun this. that hour which nature cannot long delay and hope to possess, in a better state, that happiness which here I could not find, and that virtue which here I have not attained '

He rose and went away, leaving his audience not much clated with the hope of long life. The Prince consoled limited with remarking, that it was not reasonable to be disappointed by this account, for age had never been considered as the season of felicity, and if it was possible to be easy in decline and weakness, it was likely that the days of vigour and alacity might be happy: that the noon of life might be bright, if the evening could be calm. The Princess suspected that age was querulous and malignant, and delighted to repress the expectations of those who had newly entered the world. She had seen the possessors of estates look with envy on their heirs, and known many who enjoyed pleasure no longer than they can confine it to themselves.

Pekuah conjectured, that the man was older than he appeared, and was willing to impute his complaints to delirious dejection. or else supposed that he had been unfortunate, and was therefore discontented: "For nothing, said she, is more common, than to call our own condition, the condition of life."

Imlac, who had no desire to see them depressed, smiled at the comforts which they could so readily procure to themselves, and remembered, that at the same age, he was equally confident of unmingled prosperity, and equally fertile of consolatory expedients. He forbore to force upon them unwelcome knowledge, which time itself would too soon impress. The Princess and her lady retired, the madness of the astronomer hung upon their minds, and they desired Imlac to enter upon his office, and delay next morning the rising of the sun.

THE PRINCESS AND PERUAH VISIT THE ASTRONOMER.

The Princess and Pekuah having talked in private of Imlac's astronomer, thought his character at once so amrable and so strange, that they could not be satisfied without a nearer I nowledge, and Imlac was requested to find the means of bringing them together

This was somewhat difficult, the philosopher had never received any visits from women though he lived in a city that had in it many Europeans who followed the manners of their own countries, and many from other parts of the world that had there with European liberty The lidies would not be refused, and several schemes were proposed for the accomplishment of their design It was proposed to introduce them as strangers in distress, to whom the sage was always accessible but after some deliberation, it appeared that by this artifice, no acquaintance could be formed, for their conversation would be short, and they could not decently impor-' This, said Russelas, is time but tune him often I have yet a stronger objection against the misrepresentation of your state I have always considered it as treason against the great republick of human na ture, to make any man's virtues the means of deceiv ing him, whether on great or little occasions imposture weakens confidence, and chills benevolence When the sage finds that you are not what you seemed, he will feel the resentment natural to a man who, conscious of great abilities, discovers that he has been tricked by understandings meaner than his own, and, perhaps, the distrust, which he can never afterwards wholly lay aside, may stop the voice of counsel, and close the hand of charity, and where will you find the power of restoring his benefactions to mankind, or his peace to himself?"

To this no reply was attempted, and Imlac began to hope that then curiosity would subside, but, next day, Pekuah told him, she had now found an honest pretence for a visit to the astronomer, for she would solicit permission to concinie under him the studies in which she had been initiated by the Arab, and the Princess might go with her either as a fellow student, or because a woman could not decently come alone "I am afiaid, said Imlac, that he will be soon weary of your company men advanced far in knowledge do not love to repeat the elements of their art, and I am not certain that even of the elements, as he will deliver them connected with inferences, and mingled with reflections, you are a very capable auditiess" "That, said Pekuah, must be my care. I ask of you only to take me thither. My knowledge is, perhaps, more than you imagine it, and, by concurring always with his opinions, I shall make him think it greater than it is"

The astronomer, in pursuance of this resolution, was told, that a foreign lady travelling in search of knowledge, had heard of his reputation, and was desilous to become his scholar. The uncommonness of the proposal raised at once his surprise and currosity, and when, after a short deliberation, he consented

The ladies dressed themselves magnificently, and were attended by Imlac to the astronomer, who was pleased to see himself approached with respect by persons of so splendid an appearance In the exchange of the first civilities he was timorous and bashful, but when the talk became regular, he recollected his powers, and justified the character which Imlac had given Inquiring of Pekurh, what could have turned her inclination towards astronomy? he received from her a history of her adventure at the pyramid, and of the time passed in the Arab's island She told her tile with case and elegance, and her conversation took possession of his heart The discourse was then turned to astronomy, Pekuah displayed what she knew he looked upon her as a product of genius and entreated her not to desist from a study which she had so happily begun

They came again, and again, and were every time more welcome than before. The sage endeavoured to amuse them, that they might prolong their usits for he found his thoughts grow bughter in their company—the clouds of solicitude vanished by degrees, as he forced himself to entertain them, and he grieved when he was left, at their departure to his old employment of regulating the seasons.

The Princess and her favourite land now watched his lips for several months and could not catch a single word from which they could judge whether he continued, or not, in the opinion of his pre ternatural commission. They often contrived to bring him to an open declaration, but he easily

As their familiarity increased, they invited him often to the house of Imlac, where they distinguished him by extraordinary respect. He began gradually to delight in sublunary pleasures. He came early, and departed late, laboured to recommend himself by assiduity and compliance; excited their curiosity after new aits, that they might still want his assistance, and when they made any excursion of pleasure or inquiry, entreated to attend them

By long experience of his integrity and wisdom, the Prince and his sister were convinced that he might be trusted without danger, and lest he should draw any false hopes from the civilities which he received, discovered to him their condition, with the motives of their journey, and required his opinion on the choice of life

"Of the various conditions which the world spreads before you, which you shall prefer, said the sage, I am not able to instruct you I can only tell that I have chosen wrong I have passed my time in study without experience, in the attainment of sciences which can, for the most part, be but remotely useful to mankind I have purchased knowledge at the expense of all the common comforts of life I have missed the endcaring elegance of female friendship, and the happy commerce of domestick tenderness. If I have obtained any prerogatives above other students, they have been accompanied with fear, disquiet, and scrupulosity, but even of these prerogatives, whatever they were, I have, since my thoughts have been diversified by more intercourse with the world, begun to question the reality. When I have been for a few days lost in pleasing dissipation, I am always tempted to think that my inquiries have ended in erroui, and that I have suffered much, and suffered it in vain."

Imhe was delighted to find that the sage s understanding was breaking through its mists, and resolved to detain him from the planets till he should forget his task of ruling them, and reason should recover its original influence

From this time the Astronomer was received into familiar friendship, and partook of all their projects and pleasures his respect kept him attentive, and the activity of Rasselas did not leave much time un engaged a Something was always to be done, the day was spent in making observations which fur inshed talk for the evening, and the evening was closed with a scheme for the morrow

The sage confe sed to Imlac, that since he had mingled in the gay tumults of life and divided his hours by a succession of amusements, he found the conviction of his authority over the skies fade gradually from his mind and beg in to trust less to an opinion! which he never could prove to others and which he not found subject to variation, from causes in which reason had no part "If I am accidentally left alone for a few hours, said he, my inveterate persuasion rushes upon my soul, and my thoughts are chained down by some irresistible violence but they are soon disentangled by the Prince's conversa tion, and instantaneously released at the entrance of Pekuah I am like a man habitually afraid of spectres, Vot. specties, who is set at ease by a lamp, and wonders at the diead which halassed him in the dark, yet, if his lamp be extinguished, feels again the teriours which he knows that when it is light he shall feel no more. But I am sometimes afiaid lest I indulge my quiet by criminal negligence, and voluntarily forget the great charge with which I am intrusted. If I favour myself in a known errour, or am determined by my own ease in a doubtful question of this importance, how dreadful is my crime!"

"No disease of the imagination, answered Imlac, is so difficult of cure, as that which is complicated with the dread of guilt—fancy and conscience then act interchangeably upon us, and so often shift their places, that the illusions of one are not distinguished from the dictates of the other. If fancy presents images not moral or religious, the mind drives them away when they give it pain, but when melancholick notions take the form of duty, they lay hold on the faculties without opposition, because we are afraid to exclude or banish them. For this reason the superstitious are often melancholy, and the melancholy almost always superstitious.

"But do not let the suggestions of timidity overpower your better reason the danger of neglect can be but as the probability of the obligation, which when you consider it with freedom, you find very little, and that little growing every day less. Open your heart to the influence of the light, which from time to time breaks in upon you: when scruples importune you, which you in your lucid moments know to be vain, do not stand to parley, but fly to business or to Pekuah, and keep this thought always prevalent, prevalent, that you are only one atom of the mass of humanity, and have neither such virtue nor vice, as that you should be singled out for supernatural favours or afflictions

THE PRINCE ENTERS, AND BRINGS INFW TOPICK

'All thus, said the Astronomer, I have often thought, but my reason has been so long subjugated by an uncontrollable and overwhelming idea, that it durst not confide in its own decisions. I now see how fatally I betrayed my quiet, by suffering the meris to prey upon me in secret, but melancholy shrinks from communication, and I never found a man before, to whom I could impart my troubles, though I had been certain of relief. I rejoice to find my own sentiments confirmed by yours, who are not easily deceived, and can have no motive or purpose to deceive. I hope that time and writery will dissipute the gloom that has so long surrounded me, and the latter part of my days will be spent in peace.'

"Your learning and virtue said Imlie, may justly give you hopes'

Russels then entered with the Princes and Pekuah, and inquired, whether they had contrived any new diversion for the next day? "Such, said Nekayah, is the state of life, that none are happy but by the anticipation of change—the change itself is nothing—when we have made it, the next wish is to change again—The world is not yet exhausted,

- "Variety, said Rasselas, is so necessary to content, that even the Happy Valley disgusted me by the recuirence of its luxuies, yet I could not foibear to reproach myself with impatience, when I saw the monks of St Anthony support, without complaint, a life not of unifoim delight, but unifoim hardship"
- "Those men, answered Imlac, are less wretched in their silent convent than the Abissinian princes in then prison of pleasure. Whatever is done by the monks is incited by an adequate and reasonable motive Their labour supplies them with necessaries; it therefore cannot be omitted, and is certainly rewarded Then devotion prepares them for another state, and reminds them of its approach, while it fits them for it Their time is regularly distributed, one duty succeeds another, so that they are not left open to the distraction of unguided choice, nor lost in the shades of listless mactivity. There is a certain task to be performed at an appropriated hour, and their toils are cheerful, because they consider them as acts of piety, by which they are always advancing towards endlesss felicity"
- "Do you think, said Nekayah, that the monastick rule is a more holy and less imperfect state than any other? May not he equally hope for future happiness who converses openly with mankind, who succours the distressed by his charity, instructs the ignorant by his learning, and contributes by his industry to the general system of life, even though he should omit some of the mortifications, which are practised in the cloister, and allow himself such harmless

- " This said Imlac is a question which has long divided the wise, and perplexed the good. I am afrud to decide on either part. He that hies well in the world is better than he that lives well in a mo mastery But, perhaps, every one is not able to stem the temptations of publick life, and if he cannot conquer, he may properly retreat. Some have little power to do good, and have likewise little strength to resist evil Many are weary of their conflicts with adversity, and are willing to eject those passions which have long busied them in vain. And many are dismissed by age and di cases from the more laborious duties of society. In mon steries the weak and timorous may be happily sheltered the weary may repo e and the penitent may medi Those retreats of prayer and contemplation have something so congenial to the mind of man, that, perhaps, there is scarcely one that does not propose to close his life in pious abstraction with a few associates serious as himself
- " Such, said Pekuah, has often been my wish, and I have heard the Princess declare, that she should not willingly die in a crowd."
- "The liberty of using harmless pleasures, proceeded Imlac, will not be disputed, but it is still to be examined what pleasures are harmless. The evil of any pleasure that Nekayah can image is not in the act itself but in its consequences. Pleasure, in itself harmless, may become mischievous, by endearing to us a state which we know to be transient and probatory, and withdrawing our thoughts from that, of which every hour brings us nearer to the beginning, and of which no length of time will bring us to the end. Mortification is not virtuous in itself, nor has any other use, but that it disengages us from the allurements of sense. In the state of future perfection, to which we all aspire, there will be pleasure without danger, and security without restraint."

The Princess was silent, and Rasselas, turning to the Astronomer, asked him, whether he could not delay her retreat, by showing her something which she had not seen before

"Your curiosity, said the Sage, has been so general, and your pursuit of knowledge so vigorous, that novelties are not now very easily to be found: but what you can no longer procure from the living may be given by the dead. Among the wonders of this country are the Catacombs, or the ancient repositories, in which the bodies of the earliest generations were lodged, and where, by the virtue of the gums which embalmed them, they yet remain without corruption"

"I know not, said Rasselas, what pleasure the sight of the catacombs can afford, but, since nothing else offers, I am resolved to view them, and shall place this with many other things which I have done, because I would do something"

They hired a guaid of hoisemen, and the next day visited the catacombs When they were about to descend into the sepulchral caves, "Pekuah, said the Princess, we are now again invading the habitations of the dead; I know that you will stay behind,

"No. behind, let me find you safe when I return' I will not be left, answered Pekuah , I will go'down between you 'und the Prince"

They then all descended, and roved with wonder through the labyrinth of subterraneous passages, where the bodies were I ud in rows on either side

CHAP XLVII

IMIAC DISCOURSES ON THE NATURE OF THE SOUL

" WHAT reason, said the Prince, can be given, why the Egyptians should thus expensively preserve those carcasses which some nations consume with fire, others lay to mingle with the earth, and all agree to remove from their sight, as soon as decent rites can be performed?' ee 7 .

". The original of ancient customs, said Imlac, is commonly unknown, for the practice often con tinues when the cruse has ceased, and concerning superstitious ceremonies it is vain to conjecture, for what reason did not dictate, reason cannot ex plan I have long believed that the practice of embalming prose only from tenderness to the remains of relations or friends, and to this opinion I am more inclined, because it seems impo sible that this care should have been general. Bud all the dead been embalmed, their repositories must in time have been more spacious than the dwellings of the living I suppose only the rich or honourable were secured from corruption, and the rest left to the course of nature. رزي کې

- "But it is commonly supposed that the Egyptians believed the soul to live as long as the body continued undissolved, and therefore tried this method of eluding death"
- " Could the wise Egyptians, said Nekayah, think so grossly of the soul? If the soul could once survive its separation, what could it afterwards receive or suffer from the body?"
- 'The Tayptiers would doubtless think erroneously, said the Astronomer, in the darkness of heathenism, and the first dawn of philosophy. The nature of the soul is still disputed amidst all our opportunities of clearer knowledge—some yet say, that it may be material, who, nevertheless, believe it to be immortal"
- Some, answered Imlac, have indeed said that the soul is material, but I can scarcely believe that any man has thought it, who knew how to think; for all the conclusions of reason enforce the immateriality of mind, and all the notices of sense and investigations of science, concur to prove the unconsciousness of matter
- "It was never supposed that cogntation is inherent in matter, or that every particle is a thinking being. Yet, if any part of matter be devoid of thought, what part can we suppose to think? Matter can differ from matter only in form, density, bulk, motion, and direction of motion—to which of these, however varied or combined, can consciousness be annexed? To be round or square, to be solid or fluid, to be great or little, to be moved slowly or swiftly one way or another, are modes of material existence, all equally alien from the nature of cogntation. If matter be once without thought,

thought, it can only be made to think by some new modification, but all the modifications which it can admit are equally unconnected with cogitative DON CL2

" But the materialists said the Astronomer, urge that matter may have qualities with which we are unacquainted

" He who will determine, returned Imlac, against that which he knows, because there may be some thing which he knows not, he that can set hypothetical possibility against acknowledged certainty, is not to be admitted among reasonable beings. All that we know of matter is, that matter is mert, senseless and lifeless, and if this conviction cannot be opposed but by referring us to something that we know not we have all the evidence that hum in in tellect can admit If that which is known may be overruled by that which is unknown no being not omniscient can arme at certainty gantly limit the Creator s power'

' Yet let us not said the Astronomer, too arro

" It is no limitation of ommipotence, replied the poet to suppose that one thing is not consistent with mother, that the same proposition cannot be at once true and fall e that the same number cannot be even and odd, that coult ition cannot be conferred on that which is are ited incapable of countation

" I know not, said Nekis in my great use of Doe that immateriality which in this question my opinion, you have sufficiently proved, necessit rily include eternal duration " Of mm iterality, said India our ideas are ne gitive, and therefore ob one. Immiterality seems Vol III (, , to imply a natural power of perpetual duration, as a consequence of exemption from all causes of decay whatever perishes is destroyed by the solution of its contexture, and separation of its parts, nor can we concerve how that which has no parts, and therefore admits no solution, can be naturally corrupted or impaired "

- "I know not, said Rasselas, how to conceive any thing without extension, what is extended must have parts, and you allow, that whatever has parts may be destroyed"
- "Consider your own conceptions, replied Imlac, and the difficulty will be less. You will find substance without extension. An ideal form is no less real than material bulk: yet an ideal form has no extension. It is no less certain, when you think on a pyramid, that your mind possesses the idea of a pyramid, than that the pyramid itself is standing. What space does the idea of a pyramid occupy more than the idea of a grain of coin? or how can either idea suffer laceration? As is the effect, such is the cause as thought, such is the power that thinks, a power impassive and indiscerptible."

"But the Being, said Nekayah, whom I fear to name, the Being which made the soul, can destroy it"

"He, surely, can destroy it, answered Imlac, since, however unperishable, it receives from a superiour nature its power of duration. That it will not perish by any inherent cause of decay, or principle of corruption, may be shown by philosophy; but philosophy can tell no more. That it will not be annihilated by him that made it, we must humbly learn from higher authority."

Pekuah was never so much charmed with any place as the convent of St Anthony, where the Arab restored her to the Princess, and wished only to fill it with pious maidens, and to be made prioress of the order: she was weary of expectation and disgust, and would gladly be fixed in some unvariable state

The Princess thought, that of all sublunary things knowledge was the best: she desired first to learn all sciences, and then purposed to found a college of learned women, in which she would preside, that, by conversing with the old, and educating the young, she might divide her time between the acquisition and communication of wisdom, and raise up for the next age models of prudence, and patterns of piety

The Prince desired a little kingdom, in which he might administer justice in his own person, and see all the parts of government with his own eyes, but he could never fix the limits of his dominion, and was always adding to the number of his subjects

Imlac and the Astronomer were contented to be driven along the stream of life, without directing their course to any particular port

Of these wishes that they had formed they well knew that none could be obtained. They deliberated awhile what was to be done, and resolved, when the inundation should cease, to return to Abissima
